APPROVAL OF THE MINUTES OF THE 162ND SESSION

Subject to the insertion of the correction received, the Governing Body approved the minutes of the 162nd Session.

DATE, PLACE AND AGENDA OF THE 51ST (1967) SESSION OF THE INTERNATIONAL LABOUR CONFERENCE

The Governing Body decided that the 51st Session of the International Labour Conference should be held in Geneva and should open on 7 June 1967.

At its 162nd Session the Governing Body had made a preliminary examination of the agenda of the 51st Session of the International Labour Conference and had decided to retain the following subjects for further consideration at its 163rd Session with a view to final determination of the Conference agenda [1]:

(a) maximum permissible weight to be carried by one worker;

(b) improvement of conditions of life and work of tenants, sharecroppers and similar categories of agricultural workers;

(c) revision of the Holidays with Pay Convention, 1936.

That decision had been taken on the understanding that the Governing Body would await the conclusions of the Preparatory Technical Conference on the Maximum Permissible Weight to Be Carried by One Worker [2] before determining the exact scope of item (a) and that it would receive law and practice reports on items (b) and (c).

At its present session the Governing Body noted that the Conference would necessarily have before it the following matters:

Report of the Director-General.

Financial and budgetary questions.

Information and reports on the application of Conventions and Recommendations.

As regards the technical items on the agenda, the Governing Body noted that the following questions were likely to be carried over from the 50th (1966) Session for second discussion:

Revision of Conventions Nos. 35, 36, 37, 38, 39 and 40 concerning old-age, invalidity and survivors' pensions.

Examination of grievances and communications within the undertaking.

With respect to new technical items, the Governing Body, after full discussion, took a series of votes in accordance with article 18 of its Standing Orders, which specifies the method of voting to be followed in fixing the Conference agenda. By

17 votes to 26, with two abstentions, it decided not to place on the agenda all of the three items which it had retained for further consideration. In the absence of general agreement on the items to be selected, it then took a series of votes to determine, by a process of elimination, the order in which the three above-mentioned items should be considered for inclusion in the agenda. In a first ballot item (c), i.e. revision of the Holidays with Pay Convention, 1936, was eliminated by 39 votes, as against three votes for the elimination of item (a) and two for the elimination of item (b). In a second ballot item (a), i.e. maximum permissible weight to be carried by one worker, was eliminated by 27 votes, as against 15 votes for the elimination of item (b). The Governing Body then decided, by 42 votes to nil, to place the remaining item—item (b), i.e. improvement of conditions of life and work of tenants, sharecroppers and similar categories of agricultural workers—on the agenda of the Conference. It further decided, by 30 votes to 12, with one abstention, to place a second new technical item on the agenda and, by 28 votes to eight, with six abstentions, that this should be item (a), i.e. maximum permissible weight to be carried by one worker. Finally, the Governing Body decided, by 24 votes to 16, with three abstentions, not to place a third new technical item on the agenda of the Conference.

In accordance with the decision taken at its 145th Session (May 1960) [1] that the question of technical assistance should be placed on the agenda of the Conference at regular intervals as a recurring item, and not as a special item to be chosen or rejected in competition with proposed new technical items, the Governing Body decided to place an item on technical co-operation on the agenda of the 51st Session of the Conference. It was understood that the Director-General would submit suggestions in this respect early in 1966.

The Governing Body noted that, as a result of the decisions thus taken, and having regard to those items which would necessarily be before the Conference, as well as those likely to be carried over from the 50th (1966) Session for second discussion, the agenda of the 51st (1967) Session of the International Labour Conference would be as follows:

I. Report of the Director-General.

II. Financial and budgetary questions.

III. Information and reports on the application of Conventions and Recommendations.

IV. Revision of Conventions Nos. 35, 36, 37, 38, 39 and 40 concerning old-age, invalidity and survivors' pensions (second discussion).

V. Examination of grievances and communications within the undertaking (second discussion).

VI. Maximum permissible weight to be carried by one worker, the exact scope of the item to be determined by the Governing Body in the light of the conclusions of the Preparatory Technical Conference on the Maximum Permissible Weight to Be Carried by One Worker, to be held in Geneva from 25 January to 4 February 1966.

VII. Improvement of conditions of life and work of tenants, sharecroppers and similar categories of agricultural workers.

VIII. Technical co-operation, the exact scope and wording of this item to be determined in the light of the suggestions to be submitted in due course by the Director-General.

[1] See Official Bulletin, Vol. XLIII, No. 7, 1960, p. 443.

The Governing Body noted that the Conference would also have before it at its 51st Session a special report on the application of the Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid of the Republic of South Africa adopted by the Conference at its 48th Session[1], submitted by the Director-General in pursuance of the request contained in paragraph 6 of the operative part of the Declaration.

Action to Be Taken on the Resolutions Adopted by the International Labour Conference at Its 49th (1965) Session

The Governing Body took the decisions summarised below in regard to resolutions adopted by the Conference at its 49th Session.[2]

Resolution concerning Paid Educational Leave

The Governing Body authorised the Director-General—

(a) to communicate the resolution to the governments of member States and, through them, to employers' and workers' organisations and other interested bodies so that they might consider the possibility of taking the first steps called for in the first paragraph of the operative part of the resolution;

(b) to communicate the resolution to U.N.E.S.C.O. and other interested international organisations for their information;

(c) to carry out research and obtain information on provisions relating to paid educational leave, as called for in the second paragraph of the operative part of the resolution; and

(d) to bear in mind the question of the adoption of an international instrument concerning paid educational leave when submitting proposals concerning the agenda of future sessions of the Conference to the Governing Body for its consideration.

Resolution concerning the Conditions of Employment of Domestic Workers

The Governing Body—

(a) requested the Director-General, in making future proposals for the programme of work of the office, to provide for intensified studies and research on the problems of domestic workers in both rural and urban areas, directing particular consideration to the problems of women workers;

(b) authorised the Director-General to communicate the resolution to the governments of member States and, through them, to employers' and workers' organisations;

(c) authorised the Director-General to request member States, on the basis of a questionnaire, to provide detailed information on the legal provisions pertaining to domestic workers in their respective countries; and

(d) requested the Director-General to submit proposals to the Governing Body concerning the early convening of a meeting of experts to study this programme.

The Governing Body noted that, in the light of the information received, the Director-General would submit to it in due course proposals concerning the action to be taken to give effect to paragraph 2 (c) and (d) of the operative part of the resolution.

Resolution concerning Vocational Rehabilitation of Disabled Persons

The Governing Body—

(a) invited the Director-General to bear in mind the Vocational Rehabilitation (Disabled) Recommendation, 1955, when preparing proposals for submission to the Governing Body in the near future regarding the selection of Conventions and Recommendations on which reports under article 19 of the Constitution are to be requested;

(b) authorised the Director-General to communicate the resolution to the governments of member States and, through them, to employers' and workers' organisations; and

(c) authorised the Director-General to undertake, resources permitting, the collection and dissemination of information on the measures and techniques employed by member States in the rehabilitation and training of disabled persons for new forms of employment.

The Governing Body noted that, in the light of the information received and collected, the Director-General would submit to it in due course proposals concerning the action to be taken to give effect to clause (c) of the operative part of the resolution.

Resolution concerning the Industrial Activities of the International Labour Organisation

The Governing Body—

(a) requested the Director-General to take account of, and implement as far as possible, the conclusions of the resolution concerning the industrial activities of the I.L.O. which fall within his terms of reference;

(b) authorised the Director-General to communicate the resolution to the governments of member States and, through them, to employers' and workers' organisations; and

(c) decided to transmit to its Working Party on the Programme and Structure of the International Labour Organisation, in so far as the latter was concerned, the resolution concerning the industrial activities of the I.L.O., requesting it to take account thereof in the recommendations which it would make to the Governing Body in accordance with its terms of reference.[1]

Resolution concerning the Carrying Out by the International Labour Organisation of Studies of the Social and Economic Consequences of Disarmament

The Governing Body—

(a) noted that the Director-General would keep the General Conference and the Governing Body informed of the work of the I.L.O. in the field of the social and economic consequences of disarmament and of the joint action with other members of the United Nations family undertaken within the framework of the Administrative Committee on Co-ordination; and

(b) authorised the Director-General to communicate the resolution to the governments of member States and, through them, to employers' and workers' organisations as well as to the United Nations and the specialised agencies concerned.

[1] See also below, pp. 11-12.

Resolution Condemning the Government of Portugal on the Grounds of the Forced Labour Policy Practised by the Said Government in Territories under Its Administration

The Governing Body—

(a) authorised the Director-General to communicate the resolution to the governments of States Members of the Organisation and, through them, to employers' and workers' organisations, as well as to the United Nations and the specialised agencies concerned;

(b) requested the Government of Portugal to communicate to the Director-General by 1 February 1966 full information on the measures taken to give effect to the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry; and

(c) requested the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations at its next session (March 1966) to make a special examination of the extent to which the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry had been implemented and to report thereon.

Resolution concerning the Employment of Young Persons on Surface Work in Mines and Quarries

The Governing Body—

(a) noted, as regards the request that a study should be made of the employment conditions of young persons employed in opencast mines, open quarries and similar operations, that the Director-General intended to give effect to this request; and

(b) requested the Director-General to draw its attention to the question of the employment conditions of young persons employed in opencast mines, open quarries and similar operations when it considered the agenda of future sessions of the International Labour Conference.

Resolution on Agrarian Reform, with Particular Reference to Employment and Social Aspects

The Governing Body—

(a) requested the Director-General to take paragraphs 70, 71 and 72 of the resolution into account when submitting to the Governing Body proposals concerning the agenda of future sessions of the Conference, regional conferences and technical and other meetings; and

(b) authorised the Director-General to communicate the resolution to the Governments of States Members of the I.L.O.—drawing their special attention to the terms of sections A, B and C of the operative part of the resolution—and, through them, to employers' and workers' organisations as well as to the Secretary-General of the United Nations and to the executive heads of the other international organisations concerned.

(Buenos Aires, 20-24 September 1965)

After considering the report on the First Session of the Inter-American Advisory Committee, held in Buenos Aires from 20 to 24 September 1965, the Governing Body took the following action.

[1] For a brief note on the session see Official Bulletin, Vol. XLVIII, No. 4, Oct. 1965, pp. 316-317.

It expressed its deep gratitude to the Government of the Argentine Republic for the facilities placed at the disposal of the Inter-American Advisory Committee and for the cordial welcome extended to it.

It authorised the Director-General to transmit the text of the report of the Committee to the governments of American member States, and through them to employers' and workers' organisations, as well as to the international organisations concerned.

Lastly, the Governing Body noted that, since some of the questions raised in the report were to have been considered by the Organisation of American States, the Organisation of Central American States and the Latin American Free Trade Association before the 163rd Session of the Governing Body, the Director-General had already, after consulting the Governing Body delegation at the meeting and with its concurrence, communicated a copy of the report to these three organisations.

Reports of the Fact-Finding and Conciliation Commission on Freedom of Association

Report of the Panel of the Fact-Finding and Conciliation Commission on Freedom of Association Appointed to Examine the Case relating to Japan

The Governing Body took note of the report of the Panel of the Fact-Finding and Conciliation Commission on Freedom of Association, which it had appointed at its 158th Session (February 1964) [1] to examine the case relating to Japan.[2]

First Report of the Panel of the Fact-Finding and Conciliation Commission on Freedom of Association Appointed by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to Examine the Complaint of Alleged Infringements of Trade Union Rights Submitted by the Greek General Confederation of Labour against the Government of Greece on 4 September 1964

The Governing Body took note of the first report of the Panel of the Fact-Finding and Conciliation Commission on Freedom of Association which it had appointed at its 162nd Session (May-June 1965) [3] to examine the complaint of alleged infringements of trade union rights submitted by the Greek General Confederation of Labour against the Government of Greece.

(Geneva, 20-28 September 1965)

Report of the Meeting of Consultants on Women Workers' Problems

(Geneva, 20-28 September 1965)

The Governing Body postponed consideration of the papers relating to these items until its 164th Session.

(Geneva, 18-28 October 1965)

The Governing Body had before it the record of the Preparatory Technical Conference on Fishermen's Questions held in Geneva from 18 to 28 October 1965, together with the texts of the conclusions adopted by the Conference.[1] Having regard to the decision reached at the 160th (November 1964) Session of the Governing Body that the exact scope of the item on fishermen's questions for the agenda of the 50th (1966) Session of the International Labour Conference should be defined in the light of the results of the Preparatory Technical Conference[2], the Governing Body decided to place the following item on the agenda of the 50th (1966) Session of the International Labour Conference for single discussion:

Questions concerning fishermen:

(a) accommodation on board fishing vessels;

(b) vocational training of fishermen;

(c) fishermen's certificates of competency.

The Governing Body also decided that the record of the Preparatory Technical Conference on Fishermen's Questions and the texts of the conclusions adopted by it, together with a questionnaire, should be communicated to member States without delay.

The Governing Body further decided to reduce to two months the period allowed to governments for the preparation of their replies to the questionnaire and likewise to reduce to two months before the opening of the session of the Conference the period by which the final report is to reach governments. It noted that, if this were done, governments might expect to receive the final report by 1 April 1966.

The Governing Body instructed the Director-General to inform member States, when transmitting to them the record of the Preparatory Technical Conference on Fishermen's Questions, that the Preparatory Technical Conference had endorsed a statement to the effect that the discussion by the International Labour Conference at its 50th (1966) Session of the item on fishermen's questions would be greatly facilitated by the presence of experts representative of all sides of the fishing industry, and that it had therefore urged that member States should give all possible consideration to this aspect when determining the composition of their national delegations and take steps to ensure that competent representatives of the fishing industry were included in such delegations.

Report of the Working Party on the Programme and Structure of the I.L.O.

The Governing Body had before it the report of the Working Party on the Programme and Structure of the I.L.O. set up at the 160th Session (November 1964)[3], which had held its third session in Geneva from 1 to 6 November 1965.

The Governing Body approved the conclusions contained in the report, which related to the major I.L.O. programme areas of conditions of life and work and the development of social institutions, and decided to communicate the report to the International Labour Conference at its 50th (1966) Session as the second report of the Working Party, for discussion in connection with the Report of the Director-General (Part II). It instructed the Director-General to make available to the Conference, as an annex to the report of the Working Party, a summary of the communications received by the I.L.O. from governments of member States and employers' and workers' organisations in respect of the proposals made at the 47th (1963), 48th (1964) and 49th (1965) Sessions of the Conference concerning the above-mentioned major programme areas.

Reports of the Committee on Freedom of Association

Eighty-fifth Report [1]

The Governing Body had before it the 85th Report of its Committee on Freedom of Association. At its sixth sitting it approved the recommendations contained therein and requested the Director-General, in the light of the concern expressed during its discussion with regard to Cases Nos. 282 and 401 (Burundi), to communicate the recommendations in paragraph 324 of the report to the Government of Burundi within the shortest possible time. In connection with these two cases it was noted that the Director-General had informed the Secretary-General of the United Nations of the position and would continue to keep him informed.

Eighty-sixth Report

The Governing Body decided to examine the 86th Report of its Committee on Freedom of Association at its 164th Session.

Reports of the Financial and Administrative Committee

The Governing Body took the following action on the reports of its Financial and Administrative Committee.

It authorised the Director-General to submit the proposed transfers within the 1965 budget to the Chairman of the Governing Body for his approval prior to the closing of the 1965 accounts in January 1966, subject to confirmation of such approval by the Governing Body at its 164th Session.

The Governing Body took a number of decisions relating to extra-budgetary accounts. It approved the proposed 1966 budgets for the accounts of the International Occupational Safety and Health Information Centre (C.I.S.), the International Social Security Association (I.S.S.A.) and the Inter-American Vocational Training Research and Documentation Centre (CINTERFOR), and decided that the C.I.S. and I.S.S.A. accounts should be maintained. It also decided that the CINTERFOR account should be maintained in 1966 and that negotiations should be continued with a view to obtaining the widest possible financial and material support for the Centre. With respect to the account for the International Institute for Labour Studies and the account for United Nations Special Fund costs, it decided that the former should be maintained for the time being and that the latter should also be maintained, subject to review by the Director-General in the light of experience gained with the programme planning system. On the other hand, it decided that, as from 1 January 1967, the account for the Inter-American Committee on Social Security (I.A.C.S.S.) and the account for United Nations Children's Fund costs should be discontinued.

The Governing Body decided, subject to a decision being taken by the General Assembly of the United Nations to continue the World Food Programme, to establish, with effect from 1 January 1966, two extra-budgetary posts of indeterminate duration, to be financed by funds received from the Programme and to be occupied respectively by the I.L.O. Liaison Officer with the Programme and his secretary.

The Governing Body expressed its warmest thanks to the Italian Government, whose generosity had made it possible to open the International Centre for Advanced Technical and Vocational Training (Turin) on 15 October 1965. It also expressed its gratitude to the authorities and organisations whose material and financial support had created favourable conditions for the preparation by the I.L.O. of the opening of the Centre and to all Italian personalities who had contributed to this achievement, especially Ambassador Arpesani and those working directly with him.

On the recommendation of its Building Subcommittee the Governing Body approved the principle of the construction of a new I.L.O. headquarters building in Geneva on the Grand Morillon property. It authorised the Director-General to negotiate the necessary agreements in this connection with the Property Foundation for International Organisations and requested him to submit those agreements and the financial proposals connected therewith to the Governing Body at its 164th (February-March 1966) Session, with a view to the making of recommendations to the 50th (1966) Session of the International Labour Conference.

The Governing Body also took certain decisions on personnel and pensions questions. It approved a number of amendments to the Staff Regulations. It approved the application of the Statute of the Administrative Tribunal to the Universal Postal Union. It authorised the Director-General, if the United Nations General Assembly at its 20th Session took decisions in respect of changes recommended in the International Civil Service Advisory Board report on review of salary scales of the Professional and higher categories of the International Civil Service, to apply parallel measures in the I.L.O. with effect from the date on which the United Nations decisions became effective.

Lastly, the Governing Body noted the information contained in the reports of the Financial and Administrative Committee.

Report of the Allocations Committee

After full discussion of the report of its Allocations Committee the Governing Body decided to refer the proposals in the report back to the Committee for further consideration at its meeting to be held in connection with the 165th (May 1966) Session of the Governing Body.

Report of the Committee on Standing Orders and the Application of Conventions and Recommendations

On the basis of the report of its Committee on Standing Orders and the Application of Conventions and Recommendations the Governing Body took the action described below.

Resolutions Procedure at Regional Conferences

The Governing Body took note of this section of the report.

Forms of Report (Article 22 of the Constitution) on the Hygiene (Commerce and Offices) Convention, 1964, and the Employment Policy Convention, 1964

The Governing Body approved the forms of report on the Hygiene (Commerce and Offices) Convention, 1964, and the Employment Policy Convention, 1964.

Preliminary Control of Resolutions Submitted under Article 17 of the Standing Orders of the Conference

The Governing Body decided that the proposals which had been submitted to the Committee on Standing Orders and the Application of Conventions and Recommendations on this subject should be referred to the Working Party on the Programme and Structure of the I.L.O.

Report of the International Organisations Committee

The Governing Body took the following action on the report of its International Organisations Committee.

Agreement with the Organisation of African Unity

The Governing Body authorised the Director-General to sign the proposed agreement with the Organisation of African Unity on behalf of the International Labour Organisation.[1]

Joint I.L.O.-I.A.E.A. Meeting of Experts on Radiological Protection in Mining and Milling of Radioactive Ores

The Governing Body took note of the report of the Joint I.L.O.-I.A.E.A. Meeting of Experts on Radiological Protection in Mining and Milling of Radioactive Ores and authorised the publication of the Code of Practice on this subject, the text of which was appended to the report.

Thirty-ninth Session of the Economic and Social Council

The Governing Body noted the action taken by the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations in respect of activities in the field of industrial development and reaffirmed the views expressed at its 160th Session[2], which had been conveyed to the General Assembly of the United Nations for consideration in connection with the recommendations of the Council. It requested the Director-General to continue to co-operate with the Secretary-General of the United Nations and the executive heads of the other specialised agencies and the International Atomic Energy Agency in strengthening the activities of the United Nations system directed to more effective industrial development programmes as an essential factor in ensuring the economic and social progress of developing countries.

Thirty-first Report of the Administrative Committee on Co-ordination

The Governing Body took note of the 31st Report of the Administrative Committee on Co-ordination as a whole.

Second Session of the United Nations Trade and Development Board

The Governing Body noted the action taken by the United Nations Trade and Development Board at its second session and requested the Director-General to co-operate with the Secretary-General of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development by providing information relevant to the preparation of his annual report on international trade and economic development, in accordance with the resolution adopted by the Board at its last session.

Other Matters

The Governing Body further took note of those parts of the reports which dealt with the following subjects: the I.M.C.O. Convention on Facilitation of International Maritime Traffic; the address of His Holiness Pope Paul VI at the General Assembly of the United Nations; the Report of the Secretary-General of the United Nations to the United Nations General Assembly; and various questions considered by the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations at its 39th Session.

Report of the Committee on Industrial Committees

The Governing Body took the following action on the report of its Committee on Industrial Committees.

Meetings of Industrial and Analogous Committees in 1967

Choice of Meetings.

The Governing Body decided, subject to appropriate financial provision being made, to include the following meetings, which are listed in order of preference, in the programme of meetings to be held in 1967:

1. Tripartite Technical Meeting for the Woodworking Industries.
2. Advisory Committee on Salaried Employees and Professional Workers (Sixth Session).
3. Second Tripartite Technical Meeting for Mines Other than Coal Mines.

Choice of Agenda Items.

The agenda items selected by the Governing Body for these meetings are indicated below.

Tripartite Technical Meeting for the Woodworking Industries.

I. Social problems in the woodworking industries: general review.

II. Technological changes in the woodworking industries and their social consequences.

III. Occupational safety, health and welfare in the woodworking industries.

Advisory Committee on Salaried Employees and Professional Workers (Sixth Session).

I. General Report, dealing particularly with the following questions:

(a) action taken in the various countries in the light of the conclusions adopted at previous sessions of the Committee;

(b) steps taken by the Office to follow up the studies and inquiries proposed by the Committee; and

(c) recent events and developments affecting non-manual workers.

II. The impact of social and economic developments on working and living conditions in the distributive trades.

III. The role of non-manual workers in economic and social development, and the need for their training.

Second Tripartite Technical Meeting for Mines Other than Coal Mines.

I. General Report, dealing particularly with—

(a) action taken in various countries in the light of the conclusions adopted at the first Tripartite Technical Meeting for Mines Other than Coal Mines;

(b) steps taken by the Office to follow up the studies and inquiries proposed by the first Tripartite Technical Meeting for Mines Other than Coal Mines; and

(c) recent events and developments in mines other than coal mines;

II. Employment and conditions of work in the mining industry, in the light of fluctuations in the international mineral trade.

III. Measures—particularly training—needed to meet safety and health requirements in mines other than coal mines.

It was understood that the General Report would include a review of problems of labour inspection.

Meeting of Experts on Conditions of Work in Urban Transport Services [1]

The Governing Body invited the Director-General—

(a) to communicate the report and conclusions of the Meeting of Experts on Conditions of Work in Urban Transport Services to the governments of member States, informing them that the Governing Body had expressed no opinion on the content of these texts and requesting them to bring the texts to the knowledge of the authorities and employers' and workers' organisations concerned; and

(b) to take all necessary steps in order that the Inland Transport Committee, at its Eighth Session, might be adequately informed of the work of the Meeting of Experts.

The Governing Body authorised the Director-General, within the work programme of the Office, to continue—in all fields of activity belonging to the International Labour Organisation—the studies on working and living conditions of urban transport personnel. It further authorised the Director-General to communicate the report and conclusions of the Meeting of Experts to the international organisations concerned, drawing their attention to the views expressed by the Meeting.

Iron and Steel Committee : Effect to Be Given to the Resolution (No. 57) [2] concerning Tripartite Action regarding Vocational Training in the Iron and Steel Industry

The Governing Body invited the Director-General to give serious consideration to the request made by the Iron and Steel Committee in its resolution No. 57, adopted at its Seventh Session (1963), in the light of similar proposals received from other Industrial Committees and of the recommendations of the Working Party on the Programme and Structure of the I.L.O. in the field of human resources.

Other Matters

The Governing Body further took note of those parts of the report which dealt with the following subjects: periodical reports on the effect given by the Office to requests of Industrial Committees, and the activities of the United Nations system of organisations in the field of industrial development.

Report of the Committee on Operational Programmes

The Governing Body took the following action on the report of its Committee on Operational Programmes.

Agenda of the Next Meeting

The Governing Body decided that the agenda of the meeting of the Committee on Operational Programmes to be held in connection with the 164th Session should be as follows:

I. I.L.O. technical assistance programmes in 1965.

II. Participation of employers' and workers' organisations in I.L.O. technical co-operation activities.

III. Management development programme.

Other Matters

The Governing Body further took note of those parts of the report which dealt with I.L.O. co-operation in the Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance and with the possible inclusion of an item concerning technical co-operation in the agenda of the International Labour Conference.[1]

Examination of the Representation Submitted by the Association of Federal Servants of the State of São Paulo concerning the Application of the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), in Brazil

Report by the Officers of the Governing Body

On the basis of a report by its Officers relating to the procedure for examination of a representation submitted to the Office on 15 June 1965 by the Association of Federal Servants of the State of São Paulo concerning the application of the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), in Brazil, the Governing Body took the following action.

It decided to appoint, under article 2, paragraph 3, of the Standing Orders concerning the Procedure for the Discussion of Representations [2], a committee [3] composed of three of its members, chosen respectively from the Government, Employers' and Workers' groups, which would have the task of laying before it, before any decision was reached, proposals concerning the steps to be taken at each of the stages of the procedure. It empowered this committee to perform all the functions entrusted by the Standing Orders concerning the Procedure for the Discussion of Representations to the Governing Body as a whole until the committee was in a position to submit to the Governing Body proposals as to the action, if any, to be taken on the representation, it being understood that the committee would report to the Governing Body in due course.

Composition and Agenda of Committees and of Various Meetings

Meeting of Experts on Discrimination in Employment [1]

At its 159th Session (June-July 1964) the Governing Body had approved the future programme of the I.L.O. in the field of discrimination [2], which provided, inter alia, for the holding of a Meeting of Experts on Discrimination in Employment. At its present session it approved the detailed proposals submitted to it by the Director-General in connection with this Meeting.

It was decided that the Meeting should comprise 16 experts, eight of whom would be designated by governments, four chosen in consultation with employers' circles and four in consultation with workers' circles, the government experts to be appointed following consultations with the Governments of Belgium, Brazil, India, the Ivory Coast, Kenya, the U.S.S.R., the United Kingdom and the United States.

The Governing Body authorised its Officers, in the event of experts from certain of these countries not being available, to approve on its behalf the selection of experts from other countries, and further agreed that the experts from employers' and workers' organisations should be designated after consultation with the Employers' and Workers' groups of the Governing Body respectively, account being taken of the countries from which government experts were to be selected.

Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations

The Governing Body reappointed for a period of three years the following members of the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations:

Sir Adetokunbo Ademola (Nigeria).
Mr. C. Cardahi (Lebanon).
Mr. E. García Sayán (Peru).
Mr. A. Gubiński (Poland).
Mr. S. Kuriyama (Japan).
Mr. I. Ruiz Moreno (Argentina).

Agenda of the Third Session of the African Advisory Committee

The Governing Body had before it proposals concerning the third agenda item for the Third Session of the African Advisory Committee, which had been submitted by the Director-General in accordance with the authorisation given to him by the Governing Body at the 152nd (June 1962) Session.[3] It decided that consideration of this question should be deferred until the 164th Session, when the Director-General would submit revised proposals after consultation with those concerned.

Proposals concerning the Establishment of a Panel of Consultants on Safety in Mines

The Governing Body deferred consideration of the proposals submitted to it concerning the establishment of a Panel of Consultants on Safety in Mines until the 164th Session.

Panel of Consultants on the Problems of Women Workers

When the Panel of Consultants on the Problems of Women Workers was reconstituted by the Governing Body at its 161st Session (March 1965) [1], consultations had not yet been completed as regards Government consultants from two countries and one of the regular members of the Panel to be appointed after consultation with the Workers' group. Moreover, a vacancy was subsequently created by the death of Mrs. Wanyara Wamboi Muhanji (Kenya), one of the consultants appointed by the Governing Body at the 161st Session after consultation with the Workers' group. At its present session, therefore, the Governing Body appointed the following persons as members of the Panel, for a period expiring in March 1970:

Members nominated after consultation with governments :

Mrs. Seeta PARMANAND (India).

Mrs. Jiřina BREJCHOVA (Czechoslovakia), State Population Commission; member of the editorial staff of Práce (Prague).

Mrs. Lucy MVUBELO (Republic of South Africa), Organising Secretary, Garment Workers' Union of African Women, Johannesburg.

Miss Judith NAMUDDU (Uganda), Uganda Trades Union Congress.

Meeting of Experts on the Outline and Content of the Encyclopaedia of Occupational Health and Safety [2]

At its 162nd Session (May-June 1965) the Governing Body had approved proposals relating to the preparation of an Encyclopaedia of Occupational Health and Safety [3], including a proposal that there should be a meeting of experts to advise on the plan for the Encyclopaedia. At its present session the Governing Body approved the following arrangements for the Meeting of Experts.

Agenda.

The agenda of the Meeting will consist of the following items:

I. Determination of the list of articles.

II. Internal arrangement of the articles.

III. Criteria for the preparation of the articles.

IV. Other questions.

INTER-AMERICAN VOCATIONAL TRAINING RESEARCH AND DOCUMENTATION CENTRE (CINTERFOR)

Pro memoria : No paper was before the Governing Body on this item on its agenda.[1]

REPORT OF THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL

Obituary

The Governing Body asked the Director-General to convey its sympathy to the families of the late Mr. Einar Nielsen, Professor James T. Shotwell, Mr. Gabriel Saintigny, Professor Ernest Beaglehole and Mrs. Albert Thomas. It further asked the Director-General to convey its sympathy on the death of Mr. Nicolas Biever to Mr. Biever's family and to the Luxembourg Government.

Composition of the Organisation

The Governing Body noted that Singapore had become a Member of the Organisation [2] and that Albania had given notice of its intention to withdraw therefrom.

Composition of the Governing Body

The Governing Body took note of the following changes in its composition:

Workers' group.

In accordance with article 5, paragraph 5, of the Standing Orders of the Governing Body the Workers' group has appointed Mr. Bertil BOLIN (Swedish) as a Workers' regular member to fill the vacancy created by the death of Mr. E. Nielsen, and Mr. Dionigi COPPO (Italian) as a Workers' deputy member to fill the vacancy created by the resignation of Mr. B. Storti.

[1] Certain decisions relating to CINTERFOR were, however, taken by the Governing Body at its present session on the basis of a report of its Financial and Administrative Committee (see above, p. 12).

Progress of International Labour Legislation

Internal Administration

Publications

The Governing Body took note of these sections of the report.

Communication from the Government of the People's Republic of Albania Giving Notice of Its Intention to Withdraw from the International Labour Organisation

The Governing Body took note of the text of the letter addressed to the Director-General on 30 July 1965 by the Minister of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of Albania, giving notice of his Government's intention to withdraw from the International Labour Organisation, and of the text of the Director-General's reply, dated 7 August 1965.

Constitution of a Committee on Technical Meetings

The Governing Body decided to refer the Director-General's proposal relating to the establishment of a Committee on Technical Meetings to its Working Party on the Programme and Structure of the I.L.O. for further consideration.

International Convention for the Protection of Performers, Producers of Phonograms and Broadcasting Organisations

The Governing Body took note of the information submitted by the Director-General under this heading.

Establishment of a Joint Committee for the Public Service : Requests for Further Action

At its 159th Session (June-July 1964) the Governing Body had noted that, when the Director-General was in a position to draw conclusions from the studies suggested by the Meeting of Experts on Conditions of Work and Service of Public Servants (Geneva, 25 November-6 December 1963), he would submit to it proposals on the future work of the I.L.O. in this field, including the convening of an international joint committee on the public service or any other suitable specialised meeting.[1] Moreover, the International Labour Conference, in the resolution concerning the industrial activities of the International Labour Organisation which it adopted at its 49th (1965) Session, invited the Governing Body, when reviewing the programme and structure of the I.L.O., to request, as appropriate, the Director-General and/or the Working Party on the Programme and Structure of the Organisation to consider, inter alia, the desirability of establishing such a joint committee.[2] In consequence, and in the light of the information submitted to it at its present session, the Governing Body authorised the Director-General to study the question of setting up a joint committee to deal with the problems of the public service and to submit to the Governing Body at an early date further proposals on the matter.

Action to Be Taken on the Resolutions Adopted by the International Labour Conference at Its 48th (1964) Session: Resolution concerning Minimum Living Standards and Their Adjustment to the Level of Economic Growth [1]

The Governing Body—

(a) took note of the Director-General's intentions in regard to the Office programme of research on the subjects covered by the third operative paragraph of the resolution concerning minimum living standards and their adjustment to the level of economic growth; and

(b) invited the Director-General—

(i) to consider including among his proposals for meetings in 1967 a proposal for a small meeting of experts, the majority of whom should be drawn from the developing countries and whose terms of reference might be to examine and report to the Governing Body on " Minimum Wage Fixing and Other Problems of Wage Policy, with Special Reference to Developing Countries ";

(ii) thereafter to consider including among his proposals for agenda items for an early session of the Conference a proposal for an item relating to minimum living standards and their adjustment to the level of economic growth.

Activities of the International Occupational Safety and Health Information Centre (C.I.S.) from 1 October 1964 to 30 September 1965

The Governing Body took note of the information submitted by the Director-General under this heading.

Arrangements for the Preparatory Technical Conference on the Maximum Permissible Weight to Be Carried by One Worker [2]

The Governing Body took note of the information submitted by the Director-General under this heading and, on the basis of oral announcements made during the session by the Government representatives concerned, of the intention of the Governments of Australia and the United States to send tripartite delegations to the Conference.

Tenth Progress Report on Action Taken as regards the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111)

The Governing Body took note of the information submitted by the Director-General under this heading.

Report of the Officers of the Governing Body: Request for Regional Consultative Status

On the recommendation of its Officers the Governing Body decided to grant regional consultative status in respect of the American region to the Latin American Confederation of Christian Trade Unionists.

States of Chief Industrial Importance

The Governing Body decided that it would not be expedient to review the list of States of chief industrial importance between the present session and the Governing Body elections to be held at the 50th (1966) Session of the International Labour Conference.

The Governing Body appointed the following delegation to represent it at the Preparatory Technical Conference on the Maximum Permissible Weight to Be Carried by One Worker:

Government group: Mr. Purpura (Italy).

Employers' group: Mr. Montt Balmaceda (Chilean).
Substitute: Mr. Kuntschen (Swiss).

Workers' group: Mr. Faupl (United States).
Substitute: Mr. Abid Ali (Indian).

Committee Responsible for Making Proposals to the Governing Body in connection with the Representation Submitted by the Association of Federal Servants of the State of São Paulo concerning the Application of the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), in Brazil [1]

The Governing Body decided that the Committee responsible for making proposals to the Governing Body in connection with the representation submitted by the Association of Federal Servants of the State of São Paulo concerning the application of the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), in Brazil should be composed of the following members:

Government group: Mr. Ago (Italy).
Employers' group: Mr. Kuntschen (Swiss).
Workers' group: Mr. Möri (Swiss).

Date and Place of the 164th Session of the Governing Body

The 164th Session of the Governing Body will be held in Geneva in accordance with the following schedule.

The Working Party on the Programme and Structure of the I.L.O. will meet from Tuesday, 8 to Saturday 12 February 1966, Monday, 7 February being reserved for group meetings of its members. Meetings of the standing Committees will be held from Monday, 14 to Friday, 25 February 1966. Group meetings will be held on the afternoon of Friday, 25 February and on Saturday, 26 February 1966, and the Governing Body itself will meet from Monday, 28 February to Friday, 4 March 1966.

Resolution concerning Southern Rhodesia

The Governing Body unanimously and by acclamation adopted the following resolution:

The Governing Body,

Disturbed at the situation created in Southern Rhodesia by the illegal declaration of independence,

Considering that the purpose of this declaration is to maintain the domination of a racialist minority over the immense majority of the population,

Considering that this situation constitutes a violation of the basic principles of the Charter of the United Nations and of the I.L.O. Constitution and of the obligations arising from the international labour Conventions applied to Rhodesia,

[1] See also above, pp. 17-18.

Noting that the Security Council is considering as a matter of urgency appropriate measures to put an end to this situation,

Conscious of the responsibility of the International Labour Organisation to promote respect for human dignity;

Requests the Director-General—

(a) to inform the Secretary-General of the United Nations that the International Labour Organisation will do everything in its power to contribute in its own sphere to such action as may be decided upon by the Security Council;

(b) to refrain from having any official or unofficial contacts, direct or indirect, with the illegal régime in Southern Rhodesia;

(c) to keep abreast of developments in the situation and to report to the Governing Body at its next session.

Other Questions

Absence of Mr. C. Riani, Workers' Deputy Member of the Governing Body

The Director-General was asked to give effect to the request made by the Chairman of the Workers' group that steps should be taken as a matter of urgency to impress upon the Brazilian Government the need to observe the provisions of article 40, paragraph 2, of the I.L.O. Constitution and make it possible for Mr. Riani to attend Governing Body sessions.

Tripartite Technical Meeting on Hotels, Restaurants and Similar Establishments

(Geneva, 4-15 October 1965)

The Tripartite Technical Meeting on Hotels, Restaurants and Similar Establishments convened by the International Labour Organisation was held at the International Labour Office in Geneva from 4 to 15 October 1965.

The following three items were on the agenda of the Meeting:

I. Review of the social and economic problems of employees in hotels, restaurants and similar establishments.

II. Methods of remuneration.

III. Organisation of work schedules and paid holidays.

Tripartite delegations were sent by 18 member States.

The Meeting set up two subcommittees to examine the two technical items, as well as a steering committee.

The Meeting adopted the reports and conclusions of the two subcommittees, together with ten resolutions.

In the " Documents " section of this issue will be found a note containing a summary of the general discussion and the texts adopted by the Meeting.[1]

Preparatory Technical Conference on Fishermen's Questions

(Geneva, 18-28 October 1965)

In accordance with a decision taken by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office at its 159th Session (June-July 1964), the Preparatory Technical Conference on Fishermen's Questions was held in Geneva from 18 to 28 October 1965.

The agenda of the Conference, as laid down by the Governing Body, included the questions of accommodation on board fishing vessels, vocational training of fishermen, and fishermen's certificates of competency.

Attended by some 95 Government, Employers' and Workers' delegates, advisers and observers from 18 countries, as well as representatives of the Governing Body and of international governmental and non-governmental organisations, the Conference established a Steering Committee and also two working parties to deal respectively with the questions of accommodation on board fishing vessels and of vocational training and certificates of competency.

The Conference adopted conclusions in the form of a proposed Recommendation on vocational training of fishermen, and two proposed Conventions concerning respectively accommodation on board fishing vessels and fishermen's certificates of competency. Proposals concerning the three proposed instruments will be drawn up in the light of observations made thereon by governments, and will be submitted to the 50th Session of the International Labour Conference in 1966 for consideration under the single-discussion procedure.

In the " Documents " section of this issue will be found a note on the Conference, including a summary of the general discussion, the reports of the working parties and the conclusions adopted.[1]

Permanent Agricultural Committee

(Seventh Session, Geneva, 22 November-3 December 1965.)

In accordance with a decision by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office at its 161st Session (March 1965) the Seventh Session of the Permanent Agricultural Committee was held in Geneva from 22 November to 3 December 1965.

The agenda fixed by the Governing Body at the same session was as follows:

I. Technical review of the I.L.O. Rural Development Programme.

II. The role of agricultural organisations in promoting economic and social development in rural areas.

III. Vocational preparation and employment of rural youth.

The Committee is composed of 28 experts appointed by the Governing Body in their individual capacity but in consultation with the governments concerned in respect of 14 experts, with the Employers' Group of the Governing Body in respect of seven experts, and with the Workers' Group of the Governing Body also in respect of seven experts.

Three experts having been unable to attend, the meeting consisted of 25 experts from the following countries: Argentina, Belgium, Canada, Chile, China (Taiwan), Congo (Leopoldville), Federal Republic of Germany, Israel, Italy, Kenya, Malaysia (two experts), Netherlands, Nigeria, Poland, Senegal, Tunisia, Uganda, U.S.S.R., United Arab Republic, United Kingdom, United States, Uruguay, Venezuela, Viet-Nam.

In addition the following international organisations were represented: Food and Agriculture Organisation of the United Nations, World Health Organisation, European Confederation of Agriculture, International Confederation of Technical Agriculturists, International Co-operative Alliance, International Federation of Agricultural Producers, International Federation of Plantation, Agricultural and Allied Workers, International Organisation of Employers, World Federation of Trade Unions.

The Governing Body was represented by a tripartite delegation.

The Office had prepared working papers on the three items on the agenda, which served the Committee as a basis for discussion.

The Committee elected as Chairman Mr. J. O. I. LONGE (Nigeria), and as Vice-Chairman Mrs. Irena GROSZ (Poland).

After exhaustive discussions, which are summarised in a report to the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, the Committee unanimously adopted conclusions which will be submitted to the Governing Body at its session in February-March 1966 and which are reproduced in the " Documents " section of this issue.[1]

(Geneva, 6-17 December 1965)

In accordance with decisions taken by the Governing Body at its 162nd and 163rd Sessions (May-June 1965 and November 1965) a Working Group of Experts on the Revision of I.S.C.O., set up to advise the International Labour Office on the preparation of a revised classification, met in Geneva from 6 to 17 December 1965.

The meeting was attended by nine experts from various regions of the world. Representatives attended from the United Nations, the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organisation, the World Health Organisation, the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development, the Intergovernmental Committee for European Migration, the Statistical Office of the European Communities and the Inter-American Statistical Institute.

Mr. Robert B. STEFFES (United States) was elected Chairman. The other members of the Working Group were Mr. C. G. BADEL (France), Mr. A. B. O. COLE (Nigeria), Mr. S. JONASSON (Sweden), Mr. P. I. LABOK (U.S.S.R.), Mr. Thein MAUNG (Burma), Mr. R. SCHMIDT (Federal Republic of Germany), Mr. D. C. STEEL (Australia) and Mr. F. I. TUCKWELL (United Kingdom).

The agenda of the meeting was as follows:

To advise the Office concerning revision of I.S.C.O.[1] in order to improve it and bring it up to date and in particular to set out the modifications of the occupational groups (major, minor and unit groups) which appear to be desirable, taking into account—

(a) the function of I.S.C.O. as a multi-purpose international standard;

(b) the need to facilitate, so far as possible, the historical continuity of data based on I.S.C.O. (1958) and the revised classification;

(c) the need to promote compilation of internationally comparable statistics of occupations in the 1970 round of population censuses.

In deciding the particular modifications of I.S.C.O. to be recommended, the Working Group should review—

(i) recent technological developments which have affected some occupations and introduced new ones;

(ii) recent experiences in both the developing and the highly industrialised countries concerning the collection and analysis of occupational data;

(iii) the practical uses made of occupational data in connection with manpower assessment and planning, migration programmes, etc.;

(iv) the suggestions and proposals for revision of I.S.C.O. submitted to the Office by the different countries.

[1] International Standard Classification of Occupations (Geneva, I.L.O., 1958).

Mr. A. ZELENKA, Chief of the Department of Research and Planning, welcomed the participants on behalf of the Director-General. He indicated that the main objective of the meeting was to advise the Office regarding the changes needed in the major, minor and unit groups structure of I.S.C.O. in order to improve its usefulness and to bring the classification up to date. In doing so, the Working Group needed to take into account recent technological changes and experience in both developing and industrialised countries while ensuring, so far as possible, the historical continuity of the classification. He also stressed the need to promote compilation of internationally comparable statistics of occupations in the 1970 round of national population censuses.

A brief summary of the discussions and conclusions arrived at is given below. The revised classification still has to be worked out in all details—in particular, the definitions of the different occupational groups have to be amended and revised wherever necessary—but the new structure recommended by the Working Group represents, in the opinion of the Group, a notable improvement on I.S.C.O. as published in 1958.

General Discussion

The general principles upon which I.S.C.O. (1958) had been based were endorsed. It was felt, however, that a more rigorous application of the basic principle of classification—namely type of work performed—was desirable. The Working Group agreed that it was not desirable to introduce distinctions which might be adopted in a socio-economic classification of individuals, such as income level, status (as employer, employee, family worker, etc.) and so forth, or those which were based on the branch of economic activity (industry) in which an occupation was carried out.

General approval was given to the elimination of two former major groups: Miners, Quarrymen and Related Workers; and Workers in Transport and Communication Occupations. The occupations concerned were transferred to other groups, some to clerical occupations and the greater part to Crafts, Production Process and Operating Occupations (including Labourers Not Elsewhere Classified).

The solutions adopted in I.S.C.O. (1958) regarding the classification of foremen, instructors and apprentices, " learners " and " trainees " were endorsed. However, it was recommended that during 1966, in revising the detailed occupational classes (five-digit codes) the Office should ensure that wherever necessary the category of foremen carrying out solely supervisory work should be specified. The Working Group approved creation of a separate unit group for sales supervisors. It also decided to establish a minor group of office supervising occupations.

It was noted that the occupations covered by a single minor or unit group of I.S.C.O. often corresponded with a wide range of educational levels and vocational training levels among the workers concerned. The Working Group considered that this difficulty in the way of use of I.S.C.O. for certain purposes could be only partially overcome by further subdivision of minor and unit groups. Moreover, unless severe restraint were exercised such a procedure would make I.S.C.O. impractical for statistical purposes.

Report of the Working Group

The report of the Working Group contains a summary of its discussions and recommendations concerning the draft proposals for revision of I.S.C.O. The draft proposals, contained in working documents prepared for the meeting by the Office, were based on some 90 replies to a questionnaire addressed in 1964 to governments and international organisations and on comments received from a number of interested individuals. The draft was revised in certain respects by the Working Group although in large measure the Office proposals were considered to be satisfactory and met with approval.

One proposal, which had strong support, was to create a separate major group for artistic, cultural and leisure occupations. This is a category which is increasing in importance in economically advanced countries and has a special significance for purposes of economic and social analysis. The Working Group, however, finally did not adopt the proposal since it did not have time to work out all the implications of such an innovation in I.S.C.O. which, so far, had included these occupations in the first major group: Professional, Technical and Related Occupations.

Major groups 2: Administrative, Executive and Managerial Occupations, and 7/8/9: Crafts, Production Process and Operating Occupations (including Labourers Not Elsewhere Classified), no longer follow the arrangement of I.S.C.O. (1958). The subdivision of directors, managers and working proprietors in I.S.C.O. (1958) was made according to branch of industry and was an exception to the general principles of subdivision according to occupation. In the new draft there is provision for directors and managers, general, and there are three separate unit groups for departmental managers (Production, Research and Development, Administrative and Business Services, and Transport and Communication Services). Unit groups in major group 7/8/9 have been rearranged to follow, in a general sense, the flow of production. Thus the following broad classes may be identified: mineral-extracting occupations, material-processing occupations, product-making occupations, structural work occupations, equipment-operating occupations and, finally, labourers not elsewhere classified. The Working Group found that this arrangement had facilitated a more rigorous application of the basic criterion " type of work performed " while allowing flexibility to introduce other considerations when required to obtain the most practical and useful grouping of occupations.

As regards " technicians " or technical workers in engineering, scientific and related occupations, the Working Group endorsed the proposal to include, as a rule, technician occupations in a separate group or groups within the same minor group as the professional and scientific occupations with which their work is closely related. Thus, separate unit groups were provided or carried over from I.S.C.O. (1958) for technicians in architecture and engineering, physical sciences, life sciences and health. The Working Group recommended, however, that the Office, in the next phase of the work on revision of I.S.C.O., give attention to the need for further subdivision according to occupational specialisation of two unit groups, namely engineering technicians (except surveyors and draughtsmen); and health diagnosing and treating, and assisting occupations, not elsewhere classified.

The Working Group adopted provisionally minor group 0-4/0-5, Health Diagnosing and Treating, and Assisting Occupations, with 11 unit groups. It recommended that these be further examined by the Office in collaboration with the World Health Organisation.

The text of the instrument of ratification of these Instruments is as follows:

Diosdado MACAPAGAL
President of the Philippines

To all to whom these presents shall come, greetings:

Know ye, That whereas Amendments Nos. 1, 2 and 3 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation were adopted at the General Conference of the International Labour Organisation, Geneva, on July 6, 1964, as regards Amendment No. 1, and on July 9, 1964, as regards Amendments Nos. 2 and 3;

Whereas, the primary purpose of Amendment No. 1 is to promote the universal application of the Conventions adopted pursuant to the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation to all peoples including those who have not yet attained a full measure of self-government;

Whereas, the main aim of Amendment No. 2 is to empower the Conference of the Organisation to suspend from participation in the International Labour Conference any Member which has been found by the United Nations to be flagrantly and persistently pursuing by its legislation a declared policy of discrimination or apartheid;

Whereas, the fundamental intent of Amendment No. 3 is to empower the Conference to expel or suspend from membership any Member which has been expelled or suspended from membership of the United Nations;

Whereas, the Senate of the Philippines in Resolution No. 74 dated May 20, 1965, in accordance with article VII, section 10 (7) of the Constitution of the Philippines, expressed its concurrence in the ratification of Amendments Nos. 1, 2 and 3 to the Constitution of the International [Labour] Organisation;

Now therefore, be it known that I, Diosdado Macapagal, President of the Philippines, after having seen and considered the said Amendments, do hereby declare the ratification by the Republic of the Philippines of the same and every article and clause thereof.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the Republic of the Philippines to be affixed.

Done in the City of Manila, Philippines, this 11th day of October, in the year of Our Lord, nineteen hundred and sixty-five, and of the Independence of the Philippines, the twentieth.

Documents of the International Labour Conference (50th Session)

In preparation for the 50th Session of the International Labour Conference (June 1966) the Office has published the following reports.

Summary of Reports on Unratified Conventions and on Recommendations [1]

This volume summarises the reports submitted by governments under article 19 of the Constitution of the I.L.O. concerning the following instruments: Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81); Labour Inspection Recommendation, 1947 (No. 81); and Labour Inspection (Mining and Transport) Recommendation, 1947 (No. 82).

Questions concerning Fishermen [2]

The Preparatory Technical Conference on Fishermen's Questions, held in Geneva from 18 to 28 October 1965, has drafted conclusions on each of the following three items on its agenda: (a) accommodation on board fishing vessels; (b) vocational training of fishermen; and (c) fishermen's certificates of competency.

The report contains a summary record of the proceedings of the Conference and three appendices containing the texts of the conclusions adopted, the reports of the working parties and a summary of the proceedings of the ninth, tenth and eleventh plenary sittings, in the course of which the conclusions were adopted.

At the end of the report is a questionnaire requesting the opinions of governments on the texts of the conclusions adopted by the Conference. On the basis of these replies the International Labour Office will prepare a second report, to be presented to the Conference at its 50th (1966) Session, with a view to the possible adoption of one or more appropriate instruments.

Examination of Grievances and Communications within the Undertaking [3]

The report consists of two chapters: the first reproduces the replies from governments to the questionnaire contained in the preliminary report [4]; the second contains Proposed Conclusions formulated in the light of replies, together with appropriate comments, with a view to a first discussion at the 50th Session of the International Labour Conference.

Minutes of the Governing Body
160th Session [5]

This volume contains a record of the discussions of the Governing Body, the documents relating to the various items on the agenda, and the decisions taken at its 160th Session (17-20 November 1964).

Workers' Education Manuals

Labour Faces the New Age [1]

Following its six predecessors—which dealt respectively with co-operation, social security, freedom of association, collective bargaining, accident prevention, and wages—the latest of the I.L.O.'s workers' education manuals is devoted to the I.L.O. itself.

Part I, dealing with the Industrial Revolution and the Scientific Revolution, discusses some of the dynamic forces that have shaped and are shaping the modern world. This is followed in Part II by a close look at the structure of the Organisation and its day-to-day working. Finally, Part III presents a variety of case histories representative of how the I.L.O. works in the field. The text is enlivened by a large number of illustrations, and three appendices contain topics for discussion, the text of the Declaration of Philadelphia and further reading lists.

I.L.O. Codes of Practice

Safety and Health in Agricultural Work [2]

The present code of practice, adopted unanimously by the Meeting of Experts on Safety and Health in Agriculture (Geneva, 20 April-2 May 1964), comprises 24 chapters on the following subjects: general provisions; farm buildings; pits, cellars and silos; fire protection; machinery; engines; land clearance and soil and crop preparation; machines for harvesting and storing produce; woodworking and metal-working machines; hoisting and transport equipment; pressure vessels; hand tools, implements and ladders; vehicles; animals; dangerous substances; electricity; handling goods; personal protective equipment; hygiene; medical aid; accommodation and feeding; farm safety and health organisation; reporting and investigation of occupational accidents and diseases; and miscellaneous provisions.

This code of practice, while not intended to replace national laws or regulations or accepted standards relating to occupational safety and health in agriculture, might be of interest to all those with responsibilities in this field, such as the competent government authorities, the manufacturers of equipment used in agriculture, the professional organisations concerned with accident prevention, employers and workers. Care has been taken as to the utility of the document to countries in course of development.

Labour and Automation

Bulletin No. 2: A Tabulation of Case Studies on Technological Change [3]

The present bulletin presents in tabular form an analysis of 160 case studies carried out in 14 countries and covering undertakings in 29 industries. These are analysed according to content in six major categories of subject-matter (kinds of technological change, economic effects, effects on employment, occupational effects, adjustment of personnel, wage effects) and a number of sub-categories. It is thus possible to identify, by country, which case studies contain information about a particular industry and subject as well as the different subjects which are covered by a particular study.

Introduction to Management Series

In the course of its technical assistance work in the fields of productivity and management development the I.L.O. has found a need to supplement its Introduction to Work Study by a " small-scale map " of the whole field of management as a preparation for study of the many specialised books available on the techniques of management. It has therefore planned a series (" Introduction to Management ") intended to provide a simple, basic guide to management as a whole.

The Enterprise and Factors Affecting Its Operation [1]

The present volume, the first in the series, is designed to assist the reader to understand clearly at the outset what the essential components and activities of an enterprise are and how closely they are linked together. To broaden the picture, the volume also outlines the main economic, political, technological and social factors which affect the operation of any enterprise in greater or lesser degree. It contains chapters on the anatomy of an enterprise, its operational activities, its financial frame, personnel, and the factors and characteristics affecting operation, appendices showing comparisons of operational activities in different groups of industries and the attributes of an enterprise and the effects produced by them, and finally a bibliography.

Reports on Various Meetings

Tripartite Technical Meeting on Hotels, Restaurants and Similar Establishments (Geneva, 4-15 October 1965).[3]

Report I: Review of the Social and Economic Problems of Employees in Hotels, Restaurants and Similar Establishments (first item on the agenda). 224 pp.

This report gives a survey of problems of international interest concerning labour-management relations, recruitment, vocational training, employment of seasonal, temporary and part-time workers, foreign workers, women and young persons, older workers, hygiene, housing and social security for employees.

Report II: Methods of Remuneration (second item on the agenda). 117 pp.

After a brief discussion of the various methods of remuneration, this report examines the subject of minimum wages and benefits in kind. It also deals with the periodicity of payment, time of payment, bonuses, long-service bonuses, profit sharing and payment of wages in the event of incapacity for work.

Report III: Organisation of Work Schedules and Paid Holidays (third item on the agenda). 129 pp.

This report deals with the various problems within the hotel industry that affect methods of organising work schedules, with particular reference to hours of work, breaks, night work, shift work and use of relief employees. It also discusses both short holidays and annual holidays. Several international labour standards applying to the employees concerned are reproduced in extenso.

Tripartite Technical Meeting on Hotels, Restaurants and Similar Establishments

(Geneva, 4-15 October 1965)

Note on the General Discussion, Reports of the Subcommittees, Conclusions and Resolutions Adopted

The Tripartite Technical Meeting on Hotels, Restaurants and Similar Establishments convened by the International Labour Organisation was held at the International Labour Office, Geneva, from 4 to 15 October 1965.

The agenda of the Meeting, which had been fixed by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office at its 157th Session (November 1963), was as follows:

I. Review of the social and economic problems of employees in hotels, restaurants and similar establishments.

II. Methods of remuneration.

III. Organisation of work schedules and paid holidays.

The International Labour Office had prepared a report on each of the above items.[1]

In accordance with a decision of the Governing Body the Chairman of the Meeting should have been Mr. Enrique Bravo Caro, Minister Plenipotentiary, Deputy Permanent Representative of Mexico to the European Office of the United Nations and the international organisations in Geneva, representative of the Government of Mexico on the Governing Body of the International Labour Office. As Mr. Bravo Caro was unable to come to Geneva, the Officers of the Governing Body designated in place of him Mr. Edwin LETTS, Ambassador, Permanent Representative of Peru to the European Office of the United Nations and the international organisations in Geneva, representative of the Government of Peru on the Governing Body of the International Labour Office.

The Meeting elected two vice-chairmen: Mr. S. A. ALAMUTU (Employers' delegate, Nigeria) and Mr. H. CEUPPENS (Workers' delegate, Belgium).

Of the 20 countries invited by the Governing Body [2] 18 were represented by tripartite delegations: Belgium, Brazil, France, Federal Republic of Germany, India, Italy, Japan, Kenya, Lebanon, Mexico, Nigeria, Switzerland, Trinidad and Tobago, U.S.S.R., United Kingdom, United States, Venezuela and Yugoslavia. The United Arab Republic was represented by a Government delegate. Senegal was invited but did not send delegates.

[2] Composition as decided by the Governing Body at its 160th Session (Nov. 1964).

Denmark and Sweden were represented at the Meeting by Workers' observers, and Ireland by an Employers' observer.

The Governing Body was represented by a delegation composed as follows:

Goverment group : Mr. E. LETTS (Peru).

Employers' group : Mr. J. O'BRIEN (Irish).

Workers' group : Mr. G. PONGAULT (Congolese (Brazzaville)).

Representatives of the European Economic Community and the League of Arab States also attended the Meeting.

In addition, observers from the following ten international non-governmental organisations attended the Meeting:

International Confederation of Free Trade Unions[1], International Federation of Christian Trade Unions[1], International Christian Federation of Food, Drink, Tobacco and Hotelworkers, International Hotel Association, International Organisation of Employers[1], International Union of Food and Allied Workers' Associations, International Union of National Associations of Hotel, Restaurant and Café Keepers, International Union of Official Travel Organisations, World Association of Cooks' Societies, and World Federation of Trade Unions.[1]

The Meeting was divided into two subcommittees for the examination of the two technical items on the agenda, namely a Subcommittee on Methods of Remuneration and a Subcommittee on Organisation of Work Schedules and Paid Holidays. In addition, the Meeting set up a steering committee.

The Meeting held nine plenary sittings, five of which were devoted mainly to a general discussion of the problems submitted to it.

At its eighth and ninth plenary sittings the Meeting examined the reports, conclusions and resolutions submitted to it.

A summary of the discussions in plenary sitting will be found below together with the text of the reports, conclusions and resolutions adopted by the Meeting.

SUMMARY OF DISCUSSIONS IN PLENARY SITTING

OPENING SPEECHES

Speeches of welcome were delivered at the opening sitting by Mr. H. A. MAJID, Assistant Director-General of the International Labour Office and Secretary-General of the Meeting, Mr. Edwin LETTS, Chairman of the Meeting, and Mr. A. HASLER, Government delegate, Switzerland.

The Secretary-General pointed out that it was the first time that an international tripartite meeting had come together to consider the social problems facing employers and workers in hotels, restaurants and similar establishments. In accordance with the basic principles of the Declaration of Philadelphia incorporated in its Constitution, the I.L.O. was required to further the application of programmes and measures aimed at raising standards of living. Such programmes related, inter alia, to efforts to ensure a just share of the fruits of progress for all, to questions of remuneration, to the right of collective bargaining and to the provision of adequate food and housing. A number of Conventions and Recommendations adopted by the International Labour Conference already applied to workers in the hotel industry. The Social Policy (Basic Aims and Standards) Convention, 1962, was applicable to all workers. Similarly, the Conventions concerning freedom of association and protection of the right to organise and bargain collectively had established the framework in which trade unions could develop their action for improved conditions of work. There were also standards and principles concerning methods of fixing minimum wages, protection of health and safety, hygiene in commerce and offices, and social security. Nevertheless, hotels, restaurants and similar establishments had to cope with numerous specific problems, which was why the I.L.O. had decided to convene the present Meeting.

The Meeting was called upon to study two technical questions: methods of remuneration, and organisation of work schedules and paid holidays. In its discussions the Meeting would wish to have regard both to the needs of consumers and customers—and consequently of undertakings—and to the aspirations of the workers concerned. The two items were to be discussed at a time when the hotel industry was expanding rapidly in most countries, and in particular the economically developing countries, while in many countries there was a serious shortage of staff, particularly of skilled personnel. Such a shortage was undoubtedly due to several factors but it would not seem to be unconnected with the living and working conditions of the workers concerned. It was, therefore, natural to hope that improvements in conditions of life and work in a rapidly developing world would be applied to all the workers. In that connection it had to be borne in mind that the large number of small establishments, the geographical distribution of establishments, the character of work and the general traditions constituted so many factors which had, in a number of countries, adversely affected the efficiency of employers' and workers' organisations. The basis of sound collective bargaining and labour-management relations in the industry were, therefore, often lacking, and it was not surprising that conditions of work had all too frequently lagged behind those existing in other industries, thus rendering recruitment difficult. The task of the Meeting was to advise the Governing Body on the practices it considered best in regard to the matters before it. The Meeting should seek to arrive at conclusions designed to promote healthy labour-management relations and to further the purposes of social improvement within the framework of special circumstances in the industry and in individual countries.

The purpose of the first item on the agenda was to permit a broad exchange of views on the position of the industry as a whole and in particular its social problems, with a view to suggesting further action by governments, the industry or the I.L.O.

A great diversity existed within the hotel industry in each country, as well as between highly developed and developing countries. Although this problem of diversity was common to practically all the activities of the I.L.O., it had nearly always proved possible to formulate essential principles which were valid in all cases, even though some diversity in the method of application might have to be provided for. It was to be hoped that, when the conclusions to be adopted by the Meeting had been communicated to governments, they would result in practical application in the various countries.

The Chairman, recalling that 1965 had been designated " International Co-operation Year " by the United Nations, stressed the important part played by the hotel and restaurant industry in international co-operation. The movement of persons from one country to another had never been so extensive as at present. In that sense the industry was an important element in international collaboration. Moreover, the International Co-operation Year was a significant stage in the Development Decade. Economic development did not depend merely on the development of industry as such; hotels also contributed to a substantial extent because the officials, technicians and businessmen who travelled had to be accommodated and served. Such a consideration was especially important for the developing countries, as evidenced by the requests for technical and economic assistance received by the United Nations, as well as by the I.L.O. In a large number of developing countries natural conditions existed which could be developed by the tourist industry in an appropriate way, in such a manner as to improve the balance of payments, thereby permitting greater resources to be devoted to the purchase of the necessary equipment, thus making it possible to raise productive capacity and improve the standard of living of the population. It was, therefore, necessary that hotels should be properly equipped to furnish good service and that staff should possess the necessary competence, with the consequent need for training programmes. However, the efficiency of services depended not only on technical competence but also on good relations between employers and workers and good working conditions. In its discussion of those problems the Meeting should not forget that the hotel industry was changing steadily into a form of social service. Popular tourism had become a most valuable factor in making it possible for increasing numbers of workers to spend their holidays outside their industrial surroundings; the supply of feeding services to industrial workers, to schoolchildren and to hospital patients constituted a further example. By giving due consideration to such developments the Meeting would situate its work within the general programme and aims of the I.L.O. The importance of the problems before the Meeting was illustrated by the number of workers concerned. Although statistics were often incomplete or limited to certain countries, they gave a figure of more than 8 million workers. If one added the countries which had not been taken into consideration and the small establishments which were frequently not covered by statistics, the total figure would be substantially larger.

The Government delegate from Switzerland, on behalf of his Government and of the hotel employers' and workers' organisations of his country, welcomed participants, extended an invitation to an excursion and expressed his wishes for the success of the Meeting.

General Discussion

General Observations

Many delegates provided general information on the situation in their respective countries and on economic trends as well as on social legislation and the extent to which it is applied in the case of hotel, restaurant and similar workers, and on special legislation adopted in respect of such persons. In this connection several delegates referred to the great disparity in the present-day situation between the highly developed countries and many developing countries.

Importance and Development of Hotels, Restaurants and Similar Establishments

Most delegates stressed the importance of hotels, restaurants and similar establishments within the general economic and social situation in their respective countries, backing up this information with facts and figures concerning the tourist trade, the number of establishments and the suitability of their equipment in the light of modern requirements, as well as with regard to the large number of persons employed in the industry. Several delegates, among them the delegates of Brazil, France, India, Italy, Japan, Mexico, Switzerland, Trinidad and Tobago, the U.S.S.R., the United States, Venezuela and Yugoslavia, specially stressed how important it is particularly in the developing countries for foreign currency to be acquired through the tourist trade in return for a relatively modest outlay. In some countries the hotel industry already plays an important economic role. In Brazil and Switzerland, for example, it comes second in importance among those countries' economic activities, and third in France and fourth in Japan. In certain countries such special events as the Olympic Games have played a particular role in the expansion and development of the industry. In other countries, such as Brazil, India, Lebanon, Mexico, Venezuela and Yugoslavia, the tourist trade is expected to expand considerably, with similar development of hotels, etc., in view of the natural advantages and favourable climatic conditions in those countries. At present, as pointed out by a Swiss Employers' delegate, the total earnings of the hotel industry throughout the world may be estimated at over $9,000 million.

As pointed out by a United States Government delegate, among others, the factors affecting the development of tourism and consequently the hotel industry include technological progress, rising living standards, improvement in conditions of employment with particular reference to increased leisure facilities and general provision of paid holidays, and the vast number of persons travelling for official or private reasons, which means that the countries of the world are becoming increasingly interdependent.

Other delegates referred to the expansion of social tourism, including motorised forms, and the resultant problems for the hotel industry. An Italian Government delegate stressed the value of promoting all-season tourism in order to cope with the difficulties due to fluctuation in employment which may be considerable between the peak and off-seasons.

Special reference was made to development problems peculiar to particular sectors of the industry, such as thermal resorts in Italy or new types of undertakings in the U.S.S.R. which provide meals for home consumption or canteens operating on a self-service basis.

Legislation

Several delegates stated that in their respective countries legislation provides for minimum wages and covers subjects of general scope such as freedom of association, non-discrimination and equality of treatment, or hours of work, weekly rest periods and holidays with pay. Some delegates mentioned detailed national legal provisions covering hotel and restaurant staff—as in Belgium for instance—or stated that the questions peculiar to the trade were normally covered by collective agreements.

Freedom of Association and Trade Union Rights

The observer from the World Federation of Trade Unions stressed the need for trade union rights to be put into universal effect and for the rights recognised by international labour Conventions and Recommendations to be enjoyed in full, particularly the right to bargain at the national, local and works levels, the elimination of any intervention such as might restrict workers' freedom to join the trade unions of their choice and the right to engage in trade union activities both inside and outside the place of work. A number of other delegates, who stressed the importance of sound labour-management relations and in particular of collective bargaining, expressed similar wishes, and a resolution (No. 4) was adopted on the subject.[1]

Discrimination and Equality of Treatment

A number of delegates expressed the hope that I.L.O. action would in general help to eliminate all forms of discrimination whether based on sex, age, ethnic origin, religion or nationality. Other speakers stated that seasonal and foreign workers should not suffer from any discrimination and should enjoy conditions comparable to those of their fellow workers. It was also stressed that women and young workers should be protected against any form of exploitation. In particular, several delegates believed that it was essential to combat aspects of discrimination which frequently constituted an impediment to women workers' occupational careers, with particular reference to access to higher posts. A large number of delegates emphasised the need to apply the principle of equal pay for men and women for equal work. Cases of discrimination in this connection were mentioned in particular by the Workers' delegates of Japan and Italy, and by the observers from the International Union of Food and Allied Workers' Associations and the World Federation of Trade Unions. In this connection an Italian Employers' delegate insisted on the concept of " work of equal value " and the interpretation to be given to this concept in practice, in the light of the type of work performed and the conditions for men and women workers in respect of hours of work and night rest periods, for instance.

A resolution (No. 5) was adopted on this question.[2]

Remuneration

Most of the speakers who took part in the general discussion dealt with different aspects of the question of methods of remuneration. This was one of the two technical items on the agenda of the Meeting and was examined in detail by a subcommittee.

Many delegates condemned tipping as a system of remuneration. Tips were described as " outmoded " by an Italian Workers' delegate, " absurd " by an observer from the World Federation of Trade Unions, since the client had no contractual relationship with the worker, and " humiliating " by a Yugoslav Workers' delegate.

Many delegates spoke in favour of a guaranteed minimum wage, referring to systems already established in their countries or stating that the present shortcomings in minimum wages or minimum standards of living in their respective countries should be remedied. Several solutions were mentioned: in the first place, and very obviously, the adoption of minimum wage legislation, to be supplemented by collective bargaining, as indicated by the Government delegates of Nigeria and the United States; in the second place, reference of this question to trade union wage supervision committees, as suggested by a U.S.S.R. Workers' delegate, or to regional committees subject to approval by a national tripartite committee, as mentioned by a Mexican Employers' delegate; in the third place by the constitution of joint wage councils, as suggested by a Government delegate from Kenya; and in the fourth place, wage fixing in the light of job evaluation, which was proposed by a Government delegate from Trinidad and Tobago.

Other delegates went further, considering it desirable at least as an ultimate aim to introduce the principle of fixed normal wages as elsewhere in industry, total remuneration then being determined in the light of quality and volume of work, as suggested by a U.S.S.R. Government delegate, or based on occupational skills, as mentioned by the observer from the World Federation of Trade Unions.

Several delegates also mentioned overtime payment and various benefits in kind, both of which problems were studied in detail by the competent subcommittee.

Manpower Problems

The manpower shortage, particularly as regards skilled and specialised personnel, was mentioned by a large number of delegates. Even countries with an extensive tradition in the hotel industry are seriously affected by the insufficient number of local staff available, as pointed out by a Swiss Government delegate. Switzerland has to make considerable use of foreign workers, and in 1964 they represented over 50 per cent. of the total number of employees in the hotel industry.

This lack of skilled workers was mentioned in particular by Government, Employers' or Workers' delegates from such countries as France, Italy, Yugoslavia and Japan, in the last of which, in the words of a Workers' delegate, the labour shortage has led to an increase in part-time or temporary employment.

A Nigerian Government delegate said that the problem is of particular gravity for many developing countries in which the tourist trade is a key industry.

This situation can be put down to various causes, including the failure of the industry to attract workers and the conditions of work there, as mentioned, for example, by a French Workers' delegate and the observer from the World Federation of Trade Unions, or general full employment, as stated by a United Kingdom Employers' delegate, or the rapid expansion of the hotel industry, according to Government delegates from Italy and Japan.

Vocational Training and International Co-operation

A large number of delegates discussed vocational training as an essential means of overcoming the shortage of skilled and specialised staff and of meeting the steady increase in the manpower requirements of the tourist and hotel industries. Several delegates referred to the cause and effect relationship between levels of training and conditions of work. In the view of an Italian Workers' delegate the question of vocational training is of such importance that it would be advisable to convene a special meeting to deal primarily with that question and with the question of employment. In any case, it was vital that the Vocational Training Recommendation, 1962 (No. 117), should be applied everywhere through governments and employers with the collaboration of the trade unions.

Information on the present situation in several countries and on action either taken already or proposed for the future was given by several delegates. Government and Employers' delegates from the U.S.S.R. provided information on their country's system of free schools and scholarships, the facilities for accelerated training and the special courses for management personnel; Government and Employers' delegates from Italy described the system of official five-year manpower forecasts in their country and reported on the Government's intention to introduce legislation on vocational training since it had become essential to establish more specialised schools covering the various sectors of the hotel industry. Interesting information on hotel schools or trainee-run hotels, frequently described as insufficient to cope with either present or potential requirements, was provided by a number of other Government, Employers' or Workers' delegates, in particular from Brazil, Japan, Kenya, Lebanon, Mexico, Nigeria, Trinidad and Tobago, and Yugoslavia. Particular reference was made to intensive training courses for cooks and other staff, organised in Mexico by the trade unions, and the Mexican School of Tourism providing instruction in accountancy, law, human relations and languages. A United Kingdom Employers' delegate spoke on the efforts made by the employers in his country to provide appropriate means of training for young persons: a hotel school had been established at Glasgow which provided training up to higher management levels; it was planned to establish 150 other schools providing full and half-time courses; and a special chair had already been endowed at university level, another being planned for the near future. In Scotland, in particular, seasonal hotels were used with success as schools during the winter months. However, schools could not provide training for all the necessary skilled staff, and training during employment would remain essential. The importance of vocational training was emphasised by a French Workers' delegate; since the hotel industry was a national facility for welcoming visitors and brought in foreign currency without counterpart payment, it should therefore have a sufficient number of competent staff. The observer from the World Federation of Trade Unions believed that the trade unions should be enabled to participate in the organisation of apprenticeship and the administration of schools and vocational courses.

Resolutions—in particular resolution No. 8 in the part concerning apprenticeship, and the resolution (No. 12) concerning vocational training in hotels, restaurants and similar establishments—were adopted by the Meeting.[1]

Several delegates stressed the extent to which international co-operation in this field was already contributing, or could contribute, towards alleviating the difficulties encountered by the tourist industry in a number of developing countries. A United States Government delegate suggested that in this International Co-operation Year the Meeting should situate its activities entirely within the framework of such co-operation. An Indian Government delegate believed that special attention should be devoted to the possibilities offered by international economic and technical co-operation with a view to promotion of the hotel industry in the developing countries. Another important aspect of the question was emphasised by the observer from the International Union of Food and Allied Workers' Associations, who pointed out that, when the necessary expansion of international co-operation in this field is carried out, I.L.O. experts should be fully conscious of the social and human problems involved. The Workers' representative of the Governing Body of the I.L.O., who emphasised the need to establish hotel schools in the countries concerned, believed that such schools could be usefully organised on a regional basis for a particular group of countries, with a fair distribution within each region; in the meantime, the International Centre for Advanced Technical and Vocational Training in Turin could seek to conclude agreements with hotel schools in certain countries in order to enable the trainees interested in this subject to advance their vocational training. A Government delegate from Trinidad and Tobago pointed out that for training to become a reality it was essential to have qualified teachers and to arouse the interest of employers and workers; these essential conditions were not met in a number of developing countries. In the Caribbean area in particular, I.L.O. assistance would be extremely valuable; it might be envisaged within the framework of regional agreements in order to ensure maximum efficiency. A Government delegate from Kenya said that his Government, which realised the need to accelerate training programmes for hotel staff, intended to set up a school for this purpose; I.L.O. assistance would be of inestimable value for this project. An Employers' delegate from Kenya referred to the desirability of including an expert on the hotel industry in the management training project approved by the I.L.O. for 1966. A Nigerian Government delegate mentioned the hotel training programme launched in his country in 1960 with I.L.O. assistance and followed up since 1961 by accelerated courses for waiters, cooks and accountants, run by I.L.O. instructors who also train their Nigerian counterparts who are to replace them. An I.L.O. expert had now completed a plan for a permanent hotel school which would also be open to persons from other African countries. In the same connection, a Brazilian Employers' delegate described the National Commercial Apprenticeship Centre established in 1946 and the specialised schools created since then. An excellent Swiss hotel expert had been provided by the I.L.O. Government, Employers' and Workers' delegates from Yugoslavia referred to the assistance provided by the I.L.O. when the federal training centre for instructors in the hotel trade was established in Yugoslavia and referred to the valuable assistance which the I.L.O. could supply for the establishment of schools and training centres for supervisors and instructors, the exchange of experts and the provision of study fellowships in more industrialised countries. The last of these forms of assistance was also mentioned by a Government delegate from Trinidad and Tobago and a Mexican Employers' delegate. The observer from the International Union of Official Travel Organisations stated that her organisation was collaborating with the United Nations through its association with the Economic Commission for Asia and the Far East in the field of international co-operation and would be happy to extend such collaboration to the I.L.O.; although the Union's programme was on a limited scale, it included provision for exchange of trainees, symposia and seminars, fellowships and correspondence courses.

Seasonal and Migrant Workers

The problems arising in connection with seasonal and migrant workers were mentioned by several speakers. These problems were dealt with for the most part in resolutions Nos. 6 and 7 adopted by the Meeting.[1]

In such countries as Switzerland the shortage of national staff has resulted in employment, sometimes on a very wide scale, of foreign workers, who frequently have negligible qualifications; a Swiss Government delegate stated that this situation has resulted in serious difficulties with regard to absorption and assimilation of such workers. This question is closely related to the questions of recruitment and training of skilled staff and the conditions and prospects of employment in the various countries. With more particular reference to migrant workers and exchange of workers, an Italian Government delegate referred to the agreements signed by his country with the member States of the European Economic Community and with Latin American countries. An observer from the International Christian Federation of Food, Drink, Tobacco and Hotelworkers suggested the creation of an international labour permit and the drafting of a model employment contract for seasonal workers, both of which points might be put to a subsequent I.L.O. meeting. An Italian Workers' delegate noted that seasonal fluctuation in employment is a key problem. He therefore suggested such measures as promoting tourism at all times of the year, attempting to narrow the gap between peak periods and off periods through changes in investment policy, and staggering holidays with pay, perhaps through international agreements. He believed that some of the difficulties experienced by seasonal workers could also be overcome within the framework of collective bargaining. The observer from the World Federation of Trade Unions stated that, from the social and economic viewpoint, the workers concerned should enjoy the same rights as permanent workers and that they should also be entitled to repayment of the cost of travel when moving to their place of work and compensation for the time spent travelling both to and from that place. The observer from the International Union of Food and Allied Workers' Associations took a similar stand, stating that seasonal and foreign workers should not suffer from any discrimination and should enjoy conditions comparable to those of other workers, including job security and all social benefits.

Older Workers

Some delegates, in particular a Japanese Workers' delegate, stated that the staff shortage affecting the tourist and hotel industries in many countries had led to a rise in part-time or temporary employment, and in particular the re-employment of older persons under conditions which were often decidedly disadvantageous, especially as regards remuneration. A Japanese Government delegate noted that legislation had been adopted in his country to protect older workers, providing for vocational training, extension of unemployment insurance benefit and special vocational guidance courses. He suggested that a list of jobs for such workers should be drawn up in order to provide guidance in their engagement, for example as cloakroom attendants, assistant cooks and sweepers.

Organisation of Work Schedules and Holidays with Pay

This question was one of the technical items on the agenda of the Meeting. It was therefore examined by a Subcommittee, whose conclusions are reproduced below.[2] However, several delegates spoke in the course of the general discussion on the principal aspects of the question, giving information on the situation in their respective countries or making suggestions with a view to improvement. A Workers' delegate from the U.S.S.R. said that a weekly rest period of 42 hours was a statutory obligation, as were also annual holidays with pay, the entitlement for young persons amounting to 30 days. Women were granted 112 days' paid maternity leave, which could be extended, with half-hour nursing breaks every three hours. An Italian Employers' delegate stated that the compulsory night-time rest period was longer for women than for men in his country. In Yugoslavia hours of work in the hotel industry were at present 48 per week, as reported by a Government delegate, but would be reduced to 42 hours by 1970. A Japanese Employers' delegate stated that a trade union claim for reduction of the working week to 42 hours was at present being studied, and a Japanese Workers' delegate referred to the differences with regard to hours of work and holidays existing between large and small establishments. Referring to holidays with pay, a Belgian Workers' delegate mentioned the double-pay system enabling workers to spend their holidays away from home.

The observer from the World Federation of Trade Unions protested against hours of work which sometimes exceeded 72 per week; the maximum weekly hours should never exceed 48, as laid down in the Reduction of Hours of Work Recommendation, 1962. A Sunday rest period should be guaranteed at least once or twice every month. Women workers should be guaranteed two days' rest a week and at least two Sundays every month. Breaks and rest periods should in no case last less than one hour. The observer from the International Christian Federation of Food, Drink, Tobacco and Hotelworkers also referred to the need for one or two free Sundays every month, as well as annual holidays with pay, to be required by law, or otherwise by collective agreement. It was anti-social and contrary to human dignity for workers to be unable to earn a living wage except through working overtime. Workers' physical health and capacity for employment had to be scrupulously protected.

Hygiene in Premises

Remarks and suggestions were made on the various aspects of this question, and in particular by the observer from the International Union of Food and Allied Workers' Associations. The Meeting adopted a resolution (No. 9) on this subject.[1]

Social Security

Several speakers, including an Employers' delegate from Brazil, a Workers' delegate from Mexico, Employers' and Workers' delegates from the U.S.S.R. and a Government delegate from Yugoslavia, gave information on application of the principles of social security to hotel workers in their respective countries. A Mexican Employers' delegate stated that workers in his country earning the minimum wage are entitled to social security benefit without paying contributions. The problems of social security were also examined by the two technical subcommittees with regard to both permanent and temporary workers, and resolution No. 10 relates to this question.[2]

Future Action by the I.L.O.

A large number of delegates suggested that the I.L.O. should either undertake or intensify technical co-operation activities with regard to the training of workers in hotels, restaurants and similar establishments, and the relevant social problems. There were numerous proposals that the I.L.O. should convene further meetings or undertake studies respecting the specific problems affecting the workers in this industry, particularly in the developing countries, or respecting the reasons for labour turnover, recruitment and conditions of employment of seasonal and migrant workers, and vocational training and advancement. A resolution (No. 11) was adopted on this subject.[2]

Reply by the Assistant Secretary-General

At the end of the Meeting Mr. A. A. Evans, Assistant Secretary-General, gave a survey of its work and stressed the following points.

Nineteen member States which had been invited to the Meeting had sent 103 delegates, accompanied by 27 advisers. Observers from workers' organisations in two countries and an employers' organisation in another country had also participated in the work of the Meeting. If the representatives of the Governing Body and the observers from international organisations were added, the total participating in the Meeting amounted to 162 persons.

The first tripartite meeting held at a world level on the subject of hotels, restaurants and similar establishments had enabled participants to exchange ideas and experience on the social problems arising in this field in their countries and to discuss those problems which they considered the most crucial. One feature of the Meeting had been the possibility for Employers' and Workers' delegates to examine their respective preoccupations, while Government delegates had been able to note shortcomings in their national legislation with regard to the conditions of hotel workers.

Particular importance had been attached to the need either to promote or to develop the tourist industry, which was a substantial source of foreign exchange, as pointed out by a number of delegates, particularly from the developing countries. The significance of this question was highlighted by the figures quoted during discussion: in 1964 some 105 million tourists had spent nearly $10,000 million outside their own countries. A resolution drawn up by the Meeting dealt with ways of stimulating the development of the tourist industry, particularly within the framework of international co-operation. In that connection the over-all development of the industry came within the competence of the United Nations. It was desirable for national development programmes and requests for assistance addressed to the United Nations, or to specialised agencies, as the case might be, to give due priority to the promotion of the tourist industry. In the view of the I.L.O., employers' and workers' organisations should be associated in national-level planning. An appropriate Recommendation had been adopted by the International Labour Conference in 1960, and similar suggestions had been made during the present Meeting as regards the tourist industry. However, in addition to actual hotels, it was essential to have a sufficient number of trained staff. Whereas requests concerned with the general development of the hotel industry should be addressed to the United Nations, requests concerning vocational training and further training came within the I.L.O.'s scope. Co-ordination of the various requests made by any particular government within the framework of its international co-operation programme had to be ensured, therefore, and appropriate contacts between the employers and the workers, on the one hand, and the competent government authorities, on the other hand, were essential. If it received government requests that did not go beyond the scope of the funds earmarked for the purpose, the I.L.O. did everything it could to provide due assistance. In certain cases, if similar requests were put forward by several governments in the same region, it was possible to establish regional projects, pooling the available resources. The International Centre for Advanced Technical and Vocational Training in Turin would probably be able, at a later date, to consider requests such as those made during the Meeting.

When hotels were being built it should be ensured that the staff would enjoy the conditions of work corresponding to modern standards: in that connection the Hygiene (Commerce and Offices) Convention and Recommendation, 1964, provided many valuable criteria.

Even skilled workers were liable to leave the hotel industry if their conditions, and particularly their remuneration, were unsatisfactory. The excellent work performed by the two technical subcommittees was of great value in this connection. Generally speaking, in order that the industry might advance, it was desirable to provide the workers with attractive prospects for normal careers. Thanks to the spirit of co-operation and mutual understanding, the Meeting had been able to work out proposals which might stimulate action at the national level. However, the practical success of such conclusions would depend to no small extent in the various countries on labour-management relations both at the national level and within each establishment.

Reference had been made during discussion to the difficulties arising through the seasonal character of employment, which was typical in many establishments. It had been suggested that the over-all duration of holiday periods should be extended. Although that problem did not come within the direct scope of social legislation and really called for co-operation between undertakings, trade unions and the school authorities, the I.L.O. would seize every reasonable opportunity to further any action undertaken towards that end. It had already been suggested by the United Nations Conference on International Travel and Tourism in 1963 that co-ordination plans should be drawn up with regard to that problem at the national level and subsequently at the regional and international levels. An I.L.O. Meeting of Experts on Welfare Facilities for Industrial Workers in 1964 had stressed the need for efforts to be made with a view to staggering workers' holidays.

With regard to the work already done by the I.L.O., the International Labour Code constituted a valuable guide in the field of conditions of employment and work and labour-management relations. The Assistant Secretary-General hoped that delegates would make use of that Code and endeavour to apply its standards and provisions to their own sectors. He also gave information on the system of application of Conventions and annual reports on ratified instruments and on the procedure for dealing with allegations of violation of freedom of association. Similar considerations might apply to the Meeting's conclusions calling for action either by governments or by employers and workers. Where they did not yet exist, national joint councils or tripartite authorities could usefully be established in accordance with the procedure laid down in the document concerning the purposes and functions of industrial and analogous committees with a view to studying the general problems affecting the hotel industry and action to be taken in individual countries on the basis of the Meeting's conclusions.

The I.L.O. would do its best to follow up the requests for studies and subsequent meetings in the light of the I.L.O.'s general programme of activities, the priorities fixed and the resources available.

Closing Speeches

Speeches were delivered by Mr. Semichev, Government delegate, U.S.S.R., Chairman of the Government group, by the Employers' and Workers' Vice-Chairmen, by Mr. Eze, Nigerian Workers' delegate, by the Secretary-General, and by the Chairman.

All of the speakers expressed their satisfaction with the work done. The Chairman of the Government group stressed the positive results achieved by the Meeting. The Workers' Vice-Chairman hoped that the Meeting would mark the beginning of further and equally fruitful exchanges of opinion in the same spirit of mutual understanding and collaboration. The clear and unequivocal statements concerning abolition of tipping as a form of wage and the introduction of a guaranteed wage would undoubtedly have not only social but also moral effects. The Nigerian Workers' delegate emphasised the importance of the reference in several resolutions to the urgent need for ratification of certain international labour Conventions. The Secretary-General expressed his conviction that once they were known and applied the conclusions adopted would help to improve the conditions of employment of the workers concerned. The Chairman evaluated the work done by the Meeting, stressing its importance for the developing countries.

REPORTS AND CONCLUSIONS ADOPTED

Report of the Subcommittee on Methods of Remuneration [1]

Composition and Officers of the Subcommittee and of the Working Party

1. The Subcommittee on Methods of Remuneration was composed of a Government titular member, an Employers' titular member and a Workers' titular member from each of the member countries represented at the Meeting.

2. The Subcommittee appointed the following officers:

Chairman and Reporter: Mr. J. Defraiteur (Government member, Belgium).

Vice-Chairmen: Mr. V. Elwes (Employers' member, United Kingdom); Mr. H. Stadelmaier (Workers' member, Federal Republic of Germany).

3. The Subcommittee held seven sittings.

4. At its fourth sitting the Subcommittee, in accordance with article 20 of the Standing Orders for Industrial and Analogous Committees, appointed a working party to draw up draft conclusions. This working party consisted, besides the Chairman of the Subcommittee, of the following members:

Government members :

Titular members :

United States: Miss DAVID.
U.S.S.R.: Mr. SEMICHEV.
Venezuela: Mr. HERNANDEZ.

Deputy members :

Italy: Mr. GRITA.
United Kingdom: Mr. BOYD.
Yugoslavia: Mr. TOMIĆ.

Employers' members :

Titular members :

Mr. ELWES (United Kingdom).
Mr. HOLLISTER (Kenya).
Mr. PERSHAD (India).

Terms of Reference of the Subcommittee

5. The Subcommittee was asked to consider the second item on the agenda of the Meeting, namely " Methods of remuneration ". It had before it a report prepared by the Office.[1] In accepting this report as a basis for discussion, members from each of the three groups expressed their appreciation of the quality of the report and the value of the information it contained.

6. At the invitation of the Chairman the representative of the Secretary-General outlined the procedure to be followed in the discussions. He referred to the structure of the report dealing with methods of remuneration and emphasised the interest attaching to an objective examination, at the international level by the experts present, of a question so important as the one under consideration.

7. The debates of the Subcommittee were based on the list of points suggested for discussion which were contained in the report established by the Office. The Subcommittee was in agreement on the majority of the points under discussion. They are not mentioned in this report as they are embodied in the conclusions.

Methods of Remuneration

Tipping.

8. The Workers' members began the discussion by an examination of the problems related to tipping, thus showing the importance which they attached to this subject.

9. A very clear distinction was made by the Subcommittee between, on the one hand, tips as remuneration, the practice of which ought to be abolished, and, on the other, tips as a gift; the latter alone should be described by the term " tip ".

10. The attention of members of the Subcommittee was drawn to the fact that in some countries and in certain languages, the customer, who often does not know the system of remuneration for the employees, is sometimes unable to distinguish between tips as a gift, tips forming part of remuneration, service charges and the " service percentage ".

11. It was emphasised that, if the attempts made in the past to abolish the practice of tipping had failed, there had been an evolution in attitudes and in customary practices, and that steps should be taken to end the custom of offering tips, even as a gift, however firmly established it might be.

12. Tipping could satisfy the pride of the giver, but it humiliated the receiver. It might enable the customer to obtain some advantages over the other customers, sometimes even at the expense of the employer. The practice of tipping was such as to restrict the remuneration of the employees so that normal social benefits could not be accorded to them. Further, tips might partially escape taxation. Certain Workers' members went as far as to qualify tipping as a " social evil ".

13. An Employers' member was of the view that tipping constituted an incentive and that it made the employee share in the risks of the occupation.

14. A Government member considered that only a voluntary act on the part of the customers could put an end to the practice of tipping. On the other hand an Employers' member was of the opinion that if it was desired to suppress the custom of tipping it might be considered permissible for the employer to punish the worker who accepted tips.

Service Percentage.[1]

15. It was pointed out that the system of remuneration based on service percentage would not satisfy the Workers' members unless a guaranteed minimum remuneration was provided for the different categories of workers concerned. In cases where part of the service percentage assigned to a particular worker was less than the guaranteed minimum corresponding to that category of worker, the worker should receive from the employer and at the expense of the latter, in addition to his share, a sum equal to the difference between the said minimum and his share.

16. It was specified and admitted that these guaranteed minima had nothing in common with certain small fixed amounts which were sometimes guaranteed to the workers.

17. It was equally specified and admitted that a national minimum such as the guaranteed interoccupational minimum wage could be only the minimum for the lowest-paid category of workers.

18. The Workers' members insisted that each worker should have the assurance that his daily work would be paid for normally. They suggested that some measures should be taken with a view to remunerating workers in hotels, restaurants and similar establishments in the same way as workers with similar qualifications employed in other branches of activity.

[1] For the purpose of the present text the term " service percentage " has the same meaning as " service charge ", which is also in frequent use.

19. The Employers' members recognised that a guaranteed minimum income was desirable for the worker. They considered, however, that the decisions taken in each country with a view to developing or encouraging a system of service percentage, and the method to be applied in attaining this objective, should take account of the particular conditions in each country.

20. It was pointed out that the system whereby all charges were included in the bill was not an obstacle to the method of distributing whatever service percentage might be established. In this case, it was recognised that workers or their delegates should be sufficiently informed of the distribution of the amounts paid by the customers. It was mentioned that the incorporation of the service percentage was likely to raise prices in hotels, restaurants and similar establishments.

Fixed Remuneration.

21. Several members considered that fixed remuneration was likely to protect the worker against himself in that he would avoid the excessive fatigue resulting from an inclination to put in additional effort designed to increase his remuneration in cases where the latter was determined by the service charge. Fixed remuneration was also likely to draw into the occupation more young persons, who were often discouraged by the instability of the remuneration in hotels, restaurants and similar establishments.

22. It was recognised that the fixed wages should include the minima established for the occupational category, preferably by collective agreements or as otherwise agreed by the employers and workers concerned, if not by law.

23. With regard to the list of the categories of staff to which fixed remuneration should already be applied, the Employers' members emphasised that it should take account of current practice in each country and that consequently it should not be too rigid.

24. In all the cases envisaged, whatever the method of remuneration in force, the Subcommittee considered that it was desirable to inform the customers clearly about the method of paying the employees and, where appropriate, on the distribution of the amounts paid.

Methods of Regulating Remuneration

25. The Employers' and Workers' members considered that it was better to reach mutual understanding in regard to all matters concerning remuneration mainly through bargaining leading to collective agreements. The Workers' members and some Government members remarked, however, that in certain cases the law should intervene, for instance to fix minimum remuneration.

Equality of Remuneration for Men and Women Workers

26. The Workers' members insisted particularly on the fact that the principle of equal remuneration for men and women workers for work of equal value had not been applied even in some countries which had ratified the Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100). It was admitted, however, that those concerned were aware of the difficulties which arose in applying the Convention.

27. Some members recalled that a procedure existed whereby the I.L.O. could be notified in cases of violation of the national provisions corresponding to those of Convention No. 100 in force in countries which had ratified it.

Intervals of Wage Payment

28. It was recognised that in certain countries and in certain cases some improvements should be made in the normal intervals at which remuneration was paid, especially where it concerned the distribution of the service percentage.

Purchase of Jobs

29. The Subcommittee was unanimous in condemning the sale of jobs. Certain Employers' members made a reservation with regard to " concessions ", such as those granted to a barman, who was thus enabled to exploit the bar and even engage and pay his employees. The Workers' members pointed out that in such circumstances he lost the status of an employed person.

Payments in Kind

30. Several members observed that a payment in kind consisting of the supply of food and of lodging could give rise, where the old methods were followed, to disputes between employers and workers. Furthermore, in certain countries, some situations unfavourable to the workers might exist and might lead to their being excluded partially or entirely from some of the benefits of social security. In order to remedy this, certain members insisted on the need to examine these problems in detail in joint committees. Other members stated that in their countries both legislation and practice gave full satisfaction to the two parties with regard to the granting of payment in kind in the form of food and lodging.

31. A discussion on the provision and maintenance of uniforms and of work clothing showed that there were differences between one country, where the subject was regulated by legislation in all its details, and other countries, where there existed neither legislation nor regulations in this respect. Several members considered it appropriate that the employer should furnish and maintain the uniforms and the prescribed work clothing. However, faced with the difficulty of defining these uniforms and clothing, the Subcommittee adopted a compromise. Some Workers' members stated that in certain countries the employer was responsible even for the clothing of persons employed in the kitchen, by virtue of legal provisions concerning hygiene and protection of the worker. The Employers' members said that this concerned legislation in force in a particular country and that it could not thus be made the basis for a general recommendation.

32. The Subcommittee considered it premature to formulate recommendations with regard to laundering the personal clothing of employees in the wash-house of the establishment at the expense of the employer—facilities at present offered in very exceptional cases only. However, it was suggested that at least live-in employees should be permitted to wash and press their clothing in the establishment outside their hours of work.

Remuneration for Overtime

33. The Workers' members considered that the methods of remuneration for overtime should, by the increased allowances to be provided, act as a deterrent to overtime, whether at the request of the employer or in accordance with the wishes of the worker. Overtime constituted a source of fatigue which was likely to compromise the health and morale of the worker.

34. The Employers' members were of the opinion that in hotels and restaurants overtime is inherent in the very nature of the work. However, they recognised that the number of hours of overtime should be reduced and that they should be paid for at increased rates or compensated for by time off.

35. Opinions were divided on the question of determining the basis on which the remuneration for overtime worked by persons subject to service percentage should be considered. The Workers' members felt that the supplementary remuneration should be borne by the employer. The Employers' members could not support this view and no solution to this problem was proposed.

Distribution of the Service Percentage

36. The members of the Subcommittee unanimously agreed that the determination of the persons sharing in the service percentage should be settled on a fair basis.

37. In accordance with certain laws the employer was the owner of the service percentage; according to others he was only the trustee. The members were of the opinion that the employer should distribute the service percentage among the employees concerned, but the views expressed were not unanimous in regard to the determination of the categories of participants.

38. While admitting the principle of the service percentage, the Subcommittee did not formulate any proposal with regard to the methods of accounting for or registering the service percentage.

Bonuses and Miscellaneous

39. Several members emphasised the fact that bonuses given by the employer to the worker constituted an incentive which was appreciated by the worker and encouraged him to remain loyal to the establishment. Bonuses ensured that the worker, whose capital was his labour, shared in the successful operation of the undertaking. This system permitted the worker to participate in the profits of the undertaking without, however, making him lose the status of a worker.

40. With regard to the indemnities for termination of contract the Workers' members noted that they should be provided for by legislation and that it would be desirable to refer to them in collective agreements. It was indicated, however, that since this question was being dealt with at the national level it was not necessary to include it in the conclusions.

41. Regarding incapacity for work, several Workers' members felt that the remuneration in case of sickness should be maintained for at least six weeks. In cases of incapacity for work resulting from accidents the remuneration should be assured for a period exceeding six weeks. These measures seemed all the more necessary in view of the fact that workers employed in hotels, restaurants and similar establishments did not benefit, in a great number of countries, from the advantages resulting from the application of social security systems.

42. While recognising the practical obstacles making it difficult for labour inspectors to visit a great number of small establishments, the Workers' members expressed the strong desire that inspection services should be developed so as to cover more and more persons employed in hotels, restaurants and similar establishments, with the particular aim of supervising the implementation of the regulations relating to remuneration.

Presentation and Adoption of the Conclusions

43. At its fifth sitting the Subcommittee requested the working group to prepare draft conclusions taking into account the various proposals and suggestions made in the course of the discussion.

44. The working group submitted a set of draft conclusions to the Subcommittee at its sixth sitting.

45. The Subcommittee proceeded to examine the conclusions paragraph by paragraph.

46. With regard to tipping, the Government member from Venezuela made a reservation with regard to the fact that paragraph 12 dealt only with tips given as free gifts. He said that in certain countries the service percentage replaced the tip, while in others it was not customary to pay it to workers; he would have liked account to be taken of this in paragraph 13.

47. The same Government member made a reservation concerning the use in the last sentence of paragraph 14 of the expression " to which persons the percentage is distributed ", considering that the service percentage was obviously intended to be paid to workers. The Chairman recalled that the working group, after a long discussion, had used the expression " persons, being persons who work, who alone are allowed to participate " to cover at the same time the workers and the members of the family of the owner or operator, or the owner or operator himself, who shared in these percentages.

48. With regard to paragraph 30 the Employers' member from Japan made a reservation because in his country overtime was paid for by a fixed increased rate of time-and-a-quarter in accordance with the Labour Standards Law.

49. The Employers' member from Italy considered that the text of paragraph 38 should refer to remuneration stipulated in the terms of contract, which alone in his view could be reviewed. As a result he made a reservation on the subject.

50. The Government member from the U.S.S.R. thought that paragraphs 42 and 43 could be combined by crossing out the text of paragraph 42 and maintaining the text of paragraph 43 to which the words " of governments, employers and workers in each country " should be added after the words " all efforts ". As paragraphs 42 and 43 were retained, the Government member from the U.S.S.R. requested that his statement should figure in the report.

51. As regards paragraph 45, which dealt with the remuneration of young workers, some reservations were expressed by the Government members from the Federal Republic of Germany, France and Switzerland. They indicated that in their respective countries young workers could be paid at a lower rate.

52. After an exchange of views on paragraph 46, which read as follows: " It is desirable in order to encourage participation by the workers in the proper functioning of the establishment that ex gratia payments be given by the employer to the worker ", the Subcommittee unanimously decided to suppress it, considering it better to provide for the granting of ex gratia payments at the national level and without obligation. The Workers' member from the Federal Republic of Germany, however, stated that the agreement of the Workers' members on this suppression did not in any way signify that the workers had renounced ex gratia payments in the various countries, especially where this practice had been established through collective agreements.

53. The Employers' member from France made some reservations with regard to clause (a) of paragraph 47 (paragraph 46 in the annexed text of the conclusions). The granting of indemnities in the case of the final closing down of an establishment which appeared in clause (b) of the same paragraph gave rise to a long discussion. An amendment designed to suppress this section, which was submitted by the Employers' member from the Federal Republic of Germany and supported by other Employers' members, was put to the vote and rejected by five votes to 33, with three abstentions.

Adoption of the Draft Conclusions

54. After taking note of the above reservations, the Subcommittee, having taken account of the amendments made in the different paragraphs, unanimously adopted the draft conclusions annexed to the report.

Adoption of the Report

55. The Subcommittee unanimously adopted this report, at its seventh sitting, on 14 October 1965.

Geneva, 14 October 1965.

Chairman and Reporter.

Examination by the Meeting of the Report and of the Draft Conclusions concerning Methods of Remuneration in Hotels, Restaurants and Similar Establishments

At its ninth plenary sitting the Meeting had before it the foregoing report and also draft conclusions concerning methods of remuneration in hotels, restaurants and similar establishments.

In presenting the report and the draft conclusions for approval and adoption Mr. DEFRAITEUR (Government delegate, Belgium; Chairman and Reporter of the Subcommittee on Methods of Remuneration) emphasised the fact that the conclusions reflected the unanimous agreement of the Subcommittee. Dealing as they did with a very important subject, they should have a marked influence on the development of conditions of work in hotels, restaurants and similar establishments. He remarked upon the excellent spirit of co-operation which had existed in the Subcommittee and led it to draw up constructive conclusions. He recalled in particular that the most debated subject during the discussions had been the replacement of the tipping system of remuneration by a system of fixed wages or possibly, as a transitional measure, a system of service percentage. The Subcommittee had also given special attention to the questions of remuneration for overtime and of payments in kind.

Mr. BOYD (Government delegate, United Kingdom) expressed great satisfaction with the compromise solutions arrived at through the work of the Subcommittee, and recommended the adoption of the report and draft conclusions.

Mr. ADAMS (Government delegate, Trinidad and Tobago) supported the recommendation that the report and draft conclusions be adopted, and said he hoped that the co-operative spirit which had prevailed during the Meeting would continue in the application of the Subcommittee's conclusions in the different countries.

Mr. ELWES (Employers' delegate, United Kingdom; Vice-Chairman of the Subcommittee on Methods of Remuneration) said how much the Employers, even if they had not been able to get all their opinions accepted, had appreciated the spirit of understanding in which their views had been freely discussed. It had thus been possible to reach interesting conclusions; on a number of points, indeed, agreement had been complete and unanimous, and the spirit of mutual understanding revealed during the debates was expressed in the outcome. He recommended the adoption of the report and draft conclusions.

Mr. HOLLISTER (Employers' delegate, Kenya) praised the work of the Subcommittee which, he said, was especially interesting for representatives of developing countries. He supported the proposal that the report and draft conclusions be adopted.

Mr. SHANKARA (Workers' delegate, India) expressed the opinion that the draft conclusions arrived at by the Subcommittee, which he hoped would be adopted, would be of great value to all workers concerned.

Mr. STADELMAIER (Workers' delegate, Federal Republic of Germany; Vice-Chairman of the Subcommittee on Methods of Remuneration) strongly supported the adoption of the report and draft conclusions and remarked upon the importance which the latter had for workers, particularly the provisions of paragraphs 12 and 13; the moment seemed to have arrived for definitively doing away with the system of tips as wages and for achieving a system of fixed wages.

Mr. PORTMANN (Workers' delegate, Switzerland; Chairman of the Workers' group) supported unreservedly the adoption of the report and draft conclusions of the Subcommittee.

Mr. SULLIVAN (Workers' delegate, United States) hoped that the conclusions which the Subcommittee had arrived at, of which he supported the adoption, would serve as a guide to all concerned in all countries.

The Meeting unanimously approved the report of the Subcommittee and also unanimously adopted the conclusions (No. 1) concerning methods of remuneration in hotels, restaurants and similar establishments, the text of which is reproduced below.

Conclusions (No. 1) concerning Methods of Remuneration in Hotels, Restaurants and Similar Establishments [1]

The Tripartite Technical Meeting of the International Labour Organisation on Hotels, Restaurants and Similar Establishments, Convened by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office,

Having met in Geneva from 4 to 15 October 1965,

Having examined the various aspects of conditions relating to remuneration in hotels, restaurants and similar establishments,

Noting the principles and standards on conditions of work established by the international instruments adopted by the International Labour Conference and, in particular, those contained in the Minimum Wage-Fixing Machinery Convention, 1928 (No. 26), and the Minimum Wage-Fixing Machinery Recommendation, 1928 (No. 30), the Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100), and the Equal Remuneration Recommendation, 1951 (No. 90), and the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111),

Taking into account the special features of hotels, restaurants and similar establishments and the variety in national, regional and local conditions in various countries;

Adopts this fifteenth day of October 1965 the following conclusions:

1. The principles and methods referred to in the present conclusions are proposed with a view to guiding those concerned with the preparation of legislation, the adoption of regulations, the issue of arbitration awards or the negotiation of collective agreements, as the case may be.

General Principles

2. Taking due account of national conditions, it is desirable to regulate remuneration either by means of collective agreements or other such types of arrangement between the employers and workers concerned, or by means of legislation, or by other procedures recognised by the competent authorities after consultation with the employers' and workers' organisations, or by a combination of some of these methods. It is, however, preferable to regulate remuneration through collective agreements.

3. Consideration should be given to the difficulties likely to arise with regard to the method of collective negotiation in countries where employers' or workers' organisations, or organisations of both employers and workers, do not exist or are not very representative.

4. Attention has been drawn to the fact that certain countries have not ratified the Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100), the application of which is of particular importance in hotels, restaurants and similar establishments where many women are employed.

5. The member States which have not yet done so should be invited to ratify this Convention. In the countries where it has not been ratified it is desirable that the principles of this Convention, as well as the principles relating to social benefits, should be applied by the employers, even in the absence of legislation in this respect.

6. A level of remuneration sufficiently high to permit the worker to maintain his human dignity should be guaranteed to each worker.

7. In order to meet the needs of workers, the intervals at which payment of remuneration is made should not exceed one month in the case of workers whose remuneration is calculated by the month or by the year, or 16 days in other cases. After a minimum of two weeks' work, and if the employee so requests, an advance should be made in proportion to the amount of work completed.

8. In the absence of legislative or collectively agreed provisions, the periods referred to in the preceding paragraph should be determined at the time of engagement and should be scrupulously respected.

9. Notwithstanding the different systems of remuneration still prevailing in hotels, restaurants and similar establishments, the remuneration of workers ought not to depend to any great extent on factors unrelated to the legal relationship between the employer and the worker.

10. The various systems should ensure to the workers a stable and regular remuneration.

11. Measures should be taken by the employers and workers with a view to the modification of any system of remuneration which will not assure—

(a) the level of remuneration mentioned in paragraph 6;

(b) remuneration guaranteed either under the provisions of a collective agreement, or by contract, or by law, and assured by the employer;

(c) stable and regular remuneration which corresponds with the occupational category of the worker.

Tipping

12. The term " tip " shall mean an amount in cash given voluntarily and directly to the worker by the customer in addition to the amount which the customer has to pay.

13. Measures should be taken with a view to abolishing any system of treating tipping as remuneration. These should include adequate measures, by collective agreement, legislation or other procedure recognised by the competent authorities, to replace the system of treating tips as remuneration by a system of service percentage or by a system of fixed wages.

Service Percentage

14. The service percentage referred to in the preceding paragraph may be either added to the price or included in the total. When the percentage is included in the price the workers should know the amount of this percentage. The customers should be informed in all cases, by appropriate means, to which persons the percentage is distributed.

15. The system of service percentage should provide the worker with a guaranteed minimum remuneration.

16. The guaranteed minimum remuneration represents the amount that the employer guarantees the worker whenever his service percentage does not amount to the minimum.

17. This guaranteed minimum remuneration should be in conformity with paragraph 6 and should be determined for the different categories of workers in hotels, restaurants and similar establishments in accordance with one of the procedures for determining remuneration outlined in paragraph 2.

Fixed Remuneration

18. It is desirable that, progressively, the workers in hotels, restaurants and similar establishments should, as in other branches of activity, receive a fixed remuneration.

19. Minimum fixed remunerations for different categories of workers amounting to at least the levels of the remunerations referred to in paragraph 17 should be determined in accordance with one of the methods of regulation described in paragraph 2 above.

Payment in Kind

20. The value of food provided, when it is in addition to payment in cash as well as when it is included therein, should be determined by collective agreement, by contract of employment or by law.

21. If the worker is to take his food at the establishment, the amount to be paid by him to the employer should be determined at the time of his engagement.

22. If the employer is to deduct the value of the food, this value should be indicated to the worker at the time of his engagement.

23. The value agreed upon for food should be taken into account for social security or fiscal purposes and should be made known to the workers by appropriate means.

24. The value of lodgings provided, when in addition to remuneration in cash as well as when included therein, should be determined by collective agreement, by contract of employment or by law.

25. If the worker is to be lodged, any sum to be paid by him to the employer should be determined at the time of his engagement.

26. If the employer is to deduct from the remuneration the value of lodgings which he provides, the amount should be made known to the worker at the time of his engagement.

27. The value agreed upon for lodgings should be taken into account for social security or fiscal purposes and should be made known to the employees by appropriate means.

28. The allocation of the responsibility for providing and maintaining employees' work clothing should be determined by collective agreement, by contract of employment or by law.

29. The provision and maintenance of specially required clothing should be borne by the employer.

Remuneration of Overtime

30. Where the daily or weekly hours of work fixed by collective agreement or by law are exceeded, progressive increases in the rates of remuneration should apply to the overtime worked. The amount of the increased rates to be applied to hours of overtime and the taking of them into account for possible compensation by free time should be fixed by collective agreement or by law.

31. In order to avoid causing excessive fatigue and injury to the health of workers, the increased rates of remuneration should be such that the effect is to diminish the need for additional hours.

Distribution of the Percentage Service Charge

32. The proportion of the percentage service charge which is given to each person, being a person who works, participating therein should be determined by collective agreement, by contract of employment or by law and be made known to him by appropriate means.

33. The persons, being persons who work, who alone are allowed to participate in the distribution of the percentage service charge should be designated by collective agreement, by contract of employment or by law.

34. The criteria which should be taken into account for the distribution of the service charge to the persons concerned, being persons who work, should be determined by collective agreement, by contract of employment or by law.

35. Measures should be taken to ensure that the amounts accruing from the service charge, as well as their distribution, be accounted for in an appropriate manner to ensure supervision.

36. The checking of the distribution of the percentage service charge should be determined either by bipartite means, by the participation of a person within the profession chosen by the interested workers, by the participation of a person outside the profession and accepted by the workers and the employer, by a competent authority, or by a combination of the above methods.

Miscellaneous

37. The purchase of jobs should be prohibited.

38. Remuneration should be made the subject of re-examination at regular intervals.

39. The participation of representatives of the workers and their organisations at the revision of remuneration should be provided for according to terms to be defined by collective agreement or other means.

40. It would be appropriate to provide for procedures of conciliation, arbitration or other methods of settlement, according to the conditions and customs of each country, for cases where disputes may arise between the employer and the workers in regard to establishment of rates of remuneration.

41. The establishment or existence of minimum standards should not exclude the possibility of ensuring to the workers conditions of work more favourable than those fixed by these standards.

42. It is of great importance that in each country the government, employers and workers should try to improve conditions of work in hotels, restaurants and similar establishments.

Every effort should be made to strengthen the employers' and workers' organisations, thereby encouraging joint consultation.

43. Collective agreements between workers and employers are important factors in the improvement of the conditions of work of persons employed in hotels, restaurants and similar establishments. All efforts should be made to encourage this practice.

44. All policies followed in the field of remuneration should take into account all the economic and social factors having an effect upon the operation of hotels, restaurants and similar establishments, as well as the general economic situation in the country. They should lead to a substantial and continual improvement in the standards of living of the workers in the industry and to their fair share in prosperity.

45. Although recognising that in some countries legislation provides for a lower remuneration for young workers than for adult workers, it is proper to envisage for young workers who have acquired the necessary craft or professional qualifications remuneration equal to that paid for adults.

46. It is desirable in order to improve the security of the worker from the social point of view—

(a) to provide for continued payment of remuneration in case of sickness;

(b) to provide for indemnities in the case of the final closing down of an establishment.

47. In cases where legal regulations exist in respect of remuneration, the competent authority should ensure that an appropriate labour inspection service exists, whether it be a general labour inspection service or a special service set up for this purpose.

Composition and Officers of the Subcommittee and of Its Working Party

1. The Subcommittee on Organisation of Work Schedules and Paid Holidays was composed of one Government member, one Employers' member and one Workers' member from each of the delegations represented at the Meeting.

2. The Subcommittee appointed its officers as follows:

Chairman and Reporter : Mr. J. R. LLOYD DAVIES (Government member, United Kingdom).

Vice-Chairmen : Mr. E. CROFT (Employers' member, United Kingdom); Mr. J. TOWNSEND (Workers' member, United States).

3. The Subcommittee held six sittings.

4. At the fourth sitting the Subcommittee appointed a working party to draw up draft conclusions. This working party, which sat under the chairmanship of Mr. LLOYD DAVIES, was composed as follows:

Government members :

Titular members :

Belgium: Mr. DE BUCK.
Nigeria: Mr. COLE.
U.S.S.R.: Mr. POZHARSKY.

[1] Adopted unanimously.

Deputy members :

Federal Republic of Germany: Mr. BITTER.
United States: Mrs. CLIFTON.
France: Mr. DURAND.

Employers' members :

Titular members :

Mr. CROFT (United Kingdom).
Mr. MAYERHOFER (Federal Republic of Germany).
Mr. WIRTH (Italy).

Deputy members :

Mr. GEORGE (Nigeria).
Mr. GRISON (United States).
Mr. MOUKARZEL (Lebanon).

Workers' members :

Titular members :

Mr. PASTELEURS (Belgium).
Mr. RACINE (France).
Mr. TOWNSEND (United States).

Deputy members :

Mr. DOWLING (Trinidad and Tobago).
Mr. EITENEUER (Federal Republic of Germany).
Mr. PAICHE (France).

Terms of Reference of the Subcommittee

5. The Subcommittee was called upon to examine the third item on the agenda of the Meeting, namely " Organisation of work schedules and paid holidays ". The Subcommittee had before it a report which had been prepared by the Office on the subject.[1]

6. At the invitation of the Chairman, the representative of the Secretary-General introduced the report, stressing the scope and complexity of the problems before the Subcommittee for examination. He described the procedure to be followed and expressed his conviction that the Subcommittee, by agreeing to adopt conclusions based on a free exchange of views in which all the members would have participated, would be able to contribute towards improving the organisation of work schedules and paid holidays in hotels, restaurants and similar establishments.

General Discussion

7. The Meeting based its debate on the 37 proposed points for discussion set forth on pages 88 to 91 of the Office's report. It was decided to have a general discussion before proceeding to an examination of the points of detail.

8. The general discussion dealt with the essential elements to be taken into account when setting up work schedules, the methods of reconciling these various elements, and the necessity of taking certain particular aspects of the problem into consideration.

9. The Workers' members stated that it was extremely important that the personnel of hotels, restaurants and similar establishments should be protected by the same standards and should enjoy the same social benefits as workers in other industries. They referred in particular to the Reduction of Hours of Work Recommendation, 1962 (No. 116), which did not provide for any exceptions in respect of workers employed in hotels, restaurants and similar establishments. They emphatically maintained that the laying down of a number of principles regarding the protection of workers employed in hotels, restaurants and similar establishments should be the main objective of the Meeting. They considered that, among the various questions to be examined, the key problem was the recognition that hours of work in these establishments included not only the time actually worked but all the time during which a worker had to be present and ready to work and was not free to use the time for himself. It was necessary to take this into account in any provisions on hours of work in this industry defining normal hours of work, the maximum number of hours of work, and overtime. Work in the industry should in no case be considered as intermittent work. The changed nature of tourism had, moreover, had repercussions on the hotel industry. Customers were less and less likely to remain in one place, and this made the conditions of work of the personnel more difficult. Employers tended to reduce staff, with the result that slack hours occurred more rarely. Qualified personnel left the trade for other more favoured sectors. While recognising that the comfort of the customers had to be assured, the Workers' members insisted that hours of work must be kept within reasonable limits, comparable to those laid down for other sectors, in order to protect the health of the workers and to enable them to take part in social and family life and to enjoy the benefits of recreation and educational facilities. Although the earnings of a worker remunerated by tips depended upon the number of hours being worked, that was no reason for permitting the hours of work system in hotels, restaurants and similar establishments to be different from that applying in other establishments. The problem of hours of work in this industry was in a large measure one of organisation, and the employers should solve it by introducing shift work, by employing relief staff or by making use of common labour pools. Whatever the organisation, the hours of work should in no case exceed 48 a week, and the aim should be to reduce them in accordance with Recommendation No. 116. Because principles valid for all were being defined, the same conditions of work should apply for all establishments, small and large. This should also be the case for seasonal workers, who were particularly exposed to abuses.

10. The Employers' members expressed the view that work in this industry entailed many hours of presence, and was therefore intermittent work. They agreed that all hours should be paid for, but nevertheless considered that the hours must inevitably be longer. They were willing to accept the definition of hours of work formulated in the instruments of the International Labour Organisation, according to which hours of work meant the time during which a worker was at the disposal of the employer, but they wished to lay stress upon the problems which the organisation of work schedules presented to the small establishments which in fact made up the greatest part of the industry. Furthermore, they pointed out that it should not be forgotten that the employers and workers were not the only determining factors in the industry, but that there were also the customers who wanted to be properly served at all times.

11. The U.S.S.R. Government member stated that in his country the concept of intermittent work was not recognised for the purposes of labour legislation. The International Labour Organisation, which had the task of establishing progressive standards, should not recognise this concept so far as its standard-setting activities were concerned.

12. The Belgian and Swiss Government members informed the Subcommittee that, according to the legislation in their respective countries, hours of work consisted of all the time during which a worker was at the disposal of the employer.

13. The Nigerian Government member drew attention to the problems of the developing countries, where the industry being discussed was in its early stages. These countries, he said, could not put into practice the recommendations which were being advocated and which, furthermore, could have repercussions in other economic sectors of activity.

14. The Subcommittee then proceeded to an examination of the specific points dealt with below.

Hours of Work

Normal Hours of Work.

15. The Workers' members considered that the standards for the industry of hotels, restaurants and similar establishments should be brought into line with those of other sectors, and that this should be done not progressively but immediately and even given priority. In this connection they once again referred to Recommendation No. 116, which provides that, in carrying out the measures for progressively reducing hours of work, priority should be given to industries and occupations which involve a particular physical and mental strain, or health risks for the workers concerned, particularly where the manpower employed consists mainly of women and young persons.

16. The Employers' members still maintained that, for the reasons already put forward during the general discussion, hours of work in this industry were inevitably longer, and that furthermore Recommendation No. 116, in speaking of the reduction in hours of work, uses not only the word " progressive " but also recognises the different conditions in each sector. Moreover, the rate of progress depended upon the differences between hours of work in this industry and other sectors, according to each country. The adoption of standards ill-suited to the hotel industry ran the risk of increasing general expenses, and this in turn, because of a slowing down of business, would be to the detriment of all concerned.

17. The U.S.S.R. Government member considered that the levelling of conditions of work was essential, since there was nothing to justify conditions in hotels, restaurants and similar establishments being inferior to those in other industries. He also expressed the opinion that the word " progressive ", if maintained, could be or could become an escape clause.

18. Referring to staffing problems in the industry, the Workers' members stressed the increasing difficulty of recruiting personnel because of the bad conditions of work. Therefore, it was necessary to level the conditions of work as rapidly as possible so that workers would not go to other sectors, and also in order to attract young persons into the trade.

19. In reply to this observation the Employers' members pointed out that the problem was not everywhere the same. In some countries, with the development of tourism, it had not been difficult to get staff, and the work-force had even increased. However, it was desirable always to take particularly into account the fact that small establishments, often of a patriarchal nature rendering individual service, were predominant in the industry. Because of this, it was not possible to adapt working hours in the hotel industry to those of industry in general.

20. The Swiss Government member drew attention to the fact that the labour market problem in Switzerland was causing considerable concern. For some years Switzerland had had an insufficiency of manpower and, to meet its needs, thousands of foreign workers had been hired. In 1964 there were approximately 700,000 foreign workers, representing about 30 per cent. of the active population. In hotels, restaurants and similar establishments the proportion was even over 50 per cent. The Swiss people were very disturbed about this development. Such a large number of foreign workers could not be brought in and permanently assimilated. Therefore, the Government had found itself obliged to take measures to restrict the danger of foreign " overcrowding ". In these circumstances it had not been possible to reduce hours of work immediately and substantially, as had been done in certain other countries. Measures in that direction would have to be taken in stages. To do otherwise would be harmful to the hotel industry, for it would find itself no longer able to continue to provide its services in the way desired and so widely appreciated.

21. The Chairman having spoken in support of the levelling of conditions of work, the members of the Subcommittee agreed that standards in the hotel industry should be brought into line, and that without delay rather than progressively.

22. In reply to an observation made by the Nigerian Government member with regard to the difficulties which developing countries encountered in recruiting qualified personnel the Workers' members explained that, for them, the main question was not a matter of contemplating different standards for developed and developing countries, but of arriving at uniform standards for all branches of industry within any given country and, in addition, of establishing goals applicable to all countries.

23. Regarding normal hours of work, the Workers' members said that they were categorically opposed to the calculation of normal hours of work as an average over periods exceeding one week.

24. The French and Belgian Government members also expressed the opinion that this method of calculation was undesirable in the hotel industry.

25. The Employers' members on the other hand considered that this method of calculation was desirable in order to give flexibility, and that the length of the periods over which hours might be averaged could be determined by collective bargaining, according to national and local circumstances.

26. The members of the Subcommittee were unanimous in agreeing that women and young persons should be protected by special restrictions on hours of work.

Overtime.

27. The Workers' members said that it was wrong and unfortunate to insist that working hours in hotels, restaurants and similar establishments should be longer. There were many ways of remedying that state of affairs, by organising, for example, work in shifts or by employing relief staff, even if the opening and closing times of establishments had to be modified. However, whatever solution was applied, all hours worked in excess of the normal hours of work should be deemed to be overtime and paid for at a higher rate or rates, in accordance with Recommendation No. 116. Where it was the custom to compensate overtime work by the granting of free time, this free time had to be increased in the same proportion as the increase in wages for overtime, and this matter should not be left to the employer but should be the subject of an agreement between employers and workers or the workers' representatives. Restrictions on, or the elimination of, overtime could result in giving work to workers who were looking for employment. The recourse to overtime work should not be left to the choice of those concerned, because this left the door open to abuses not only by employers but also by workers who were attracted by the extra wages. A procedure for authorising overtime work should be determined through consultation or according to the usual methods in each country.

28. The Employers' members said that they were not opposed to paying an increased rate for overtime work. They wished, however, to explain that the practice of overtime work must be admitted in principle, because it was not always possible to organise the work in shifts or to make use of relief staff.

Rest Periods

Rest Breaks.

29. Despite the different practices regarding rest breaks, which vary from country to country and even within the same country, the Workers' members considered that the Meeting should formulate a number of principles on the subject as minimum standards. In their opinion the total length of rest breaks in the course of a normal working day should amount to at least one hour. In order that short breaks could be considered as rest periods they should amount to at least one-quarter of an hour.

30. The Employers' members, in agreeing with the principle that rest breaks should be fixed, considered nevertheless that the Subcommittee could not specify their length precisely, on account of the different national practices and the nature of these rest periods.

Daily Rest.

31. In the opinion of the Workers' members the minimum length of the night rest should be fixed at at least 12 hours. They also insisted that more favourable standards should be provided for in respect of women and young workers, and they referred to the provisions of existing international instruments on this matter.

32. The Employers' members, whilst approving the principle that a minimum period should be fixed, did not consider that the length of this period should be determined by the Subcommittee. With regard to special protection for women and young workers, they were not at all against the principle but warned the Meeting that special provisions could sometimes turn against those who were subject to them. If the special advantages granted to a category of workers made their work more costly, employers might be tempted to employ, at the same wage, labour which was not entitled to these special privileges.

Weekly Rest.

33. In the opinion of the Workers' members the weekly rest period should be at least one-and-a-half days. Efforts should be made to obtain, rapidly, the five-day week. These provisions should not, however, have the effect of suppressing or diminishing the daily rest which precedes the weekly rest period. Women and young workers should in all cases have a weekly rest of two days, and irrespective of whether or not women had family responsibilities. In the matter of benefits in kind during the weekly rest period, they stated that the personnel of hotels, restaurants and similar establishments preferred to have a free choice between these benefits and an equivalent cash compensation.

34. The Employers' members considered that, in principle, the weekly rest period should be fixed but that it depended upon the limits of hours of work. Regarding the maintenance of the whole of the daily rest which preceded the weekly rest period, they agreed with the principle but pointed out how difficult it would be to ensure it in practice, particularly when the work was done by shifts, since the weekly rest according to a generally accepted concept was calculated from midnight to midnight. With regard to the weekly rest of women and young workers they supported the principle of more favourable provisions.

Annual Holidays

Annual Holidays with Pay.

35. The Workers' members stated that the minimum annual holiday should amount to three weeks. An annual holiday of four weeks should be considered as the aim to be attained. With regard to temporary workers, whose conditions of work should be the same as those of other workers, they should be entitled to an annual holiday proportionate to the time they had worked, calculated on the basis of the total length of annual holiday due for 12 months' service. In order that workers in hotels, restaurants and similar establishments might have the means to benefit really and fully from their vacation, the Workers' members insisted that a supplementary holiday payment should be granted to them, and they referred to this kind of practice in some countries, particularly Belgium. This supplement would, furthermore, contribute to the development of the industry itself. The Employers' members pointed out that they could not subscribe to this practice unless it was or became the normal industrial standard in the country concerned. Finally, the Workers' members also considered that the annual holiday should increase according to length of service in the establishment and in the industry.

36. The Employers' members suggested that the length of annual holiday in the hotel industry should be in line with the general standards of the country concerned. With regard to temporary workers, they agreed that these workers should have a holiday proportionate to the time they have worked, but they considered that this right should be subject to a minimum period of service, which might be fixed at three months. With regard to an increase in the holiday according to length of service, the Employers' members considered that only length of service in the establishment should be taken into consideration.

37. The Swiss Government member remarked that in his opinion, in addition to length of service, the annual holiday should increase according to the age of the worker. In this way the holiday would be related to both the loyalty and the age of the worker.

38. The Employers' members did not oppose age as a criterion but pointed out that such a criterion might turn against the workers themselves in that it might lead to older workers finding it difficult to get employment.

39. The members of the Subcommittee agreed that the question of benefits in kind during the annual holiday should be regulated in the same way as for the weekly rest period.

Public Holidays.

40. The Workers' members suggested that the personnel of hotels, restaurants and similar establishments should be granted paid public holidays in the same way as other workers, and that they should be entitled to an increased rate of pay whenever required to work on such days.

41. The Employers' members said that they agreed with the principle. The pay, they considered, should be fixed according to the practice in each country.

Other Leave.

42. The Workers' members stated that, in addition to paid annual holidays and public holidays, workers should be granted special paid leave for family reasons, in cases of marriage, anniversary, birth or death in the family and also for the carrying out of civic or military duties.

43. The Employers' members considered that the term " family circumstances " could lead to abuses, and that the granting of special leave should be left to the discretion of the employer, according to national practice.

44. It was the unanimous opinion of the members of the Subcommittee that benefits in kind for days of special leave should be maintained and regulated as in the case of the weekly rest period and paid annual holidays.

Organisation of Work Schedules

45. With regard to the organisation of work schedules the Workers' members expressed the opinion that it was not possible for the Subcommittee to enter into the details of any one particular scheme because of the great variety of methods in practice. For this reason the Subcommittee should limit itself to formulating a number of principles to be taken into account. When work schedules were established, the points to be observed were the normal hours of work in force, the restrictions on overtime work, the necessity to eliminate overtime work by women and young workers, the minimum periods of rest and holidays and the spread-over of the working day in general. Also, care should be taken to see that the workload was fairly divided. They were convinced that these results could be obtained by introducing shift work and by employing relief staff in the larger establishments. Establishments which were not in a position to use such methods could set up common reserves of labour to which they could resort according to a rational plan. Where work was organised in shifts, the change-over of shifts and the alternating of teams should be in accordance with regular schemes and rotation cycles determined in advance in consultation with the workers concerned. The family situation of each worker should also be taken into account when working out these plans.

46. The Employers' members agreed that the organisation of work schedules should be rational and thought out in a way which would enable hours of work to be reduced. They nevertheless emphasised that it was necessary not to lose sight of the position of the small establishments which were more often unable to make use of the various systems suggested. They also pointed out that the employment of relief staff presupposed an experienced and qualified relief staff, and this was not easy to obtain.

Methods of Implementation and Supervision

47. A lively, informative and conclusive discussion, in which several members participated, took place on the subject of methods of implementation and supervision.

48. The Workers' members particularly stressed the importance of efficient labour inspection, especially in this industry of which a characteristic was the number of small establishments and where the unions were often weak. They referred to the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947, which they would like to see applied more extensively. They emphasised the usefulness of co-operation between the inspection services and the unions, which could help the inspectorate in many respects.

49. The Employers' members, whilst supporting this view, pointed out the problems which arose in respect of small establishments.

50. The Indian and Nigerian Government members and the Kenyan Employers' member described the problems arising in their respective countries, where the tasks of the inspectorate were very great and the means for inspection insufficient.

51. The Chairman, as United Kingdom Goverment member, and the United States and Swiss Government members described the experiences of their respective countries and the lessons to be learnt from their national practices.

52. The U.S.S.R. Government member described the Soviet system. Besides an official inspection carried out by state bodies, there was a " social " inspection service which, while carried out by the workers themselves, was authorised by regulations in force to intervene in the management of an enterprise and its activity.

53. The members of the Subcommittee unanimously concluded that to enable the inspection service to fulfil its tasks efficiently it was essential not only that there should be good co-ordination between the different services where there were several of them and co-operation with the unions and the employers, but also that the workers should be informed of their rights, of the powers of the inspectorate and of the persons responsible.

Consultation between Employers and Workers

54. The Workers' members pointed out that consultation between employers and workers on all matters relating to the organisation of work schedules and holidays was not only useful but should be obligatory at the level of the establishment as well as at the level of the industry.

55. The Employers' members, whilst not agreeing that these consultations should necessarily be obligatory, nevertheless considered that they were most useful at the level of the establishment.

Examination of the Draft Conclusions

56. At its fourth sitting the Subcommittee had requested its working party to prepare draft conclusions taking into account the statements and suggestions made during the discussions.

57. The working party submitted draft conclusions to the Subcommittee at its fifth sitting. These draft conclusions, drawn up on the basis of the decisions of the Subcommittee, included the outcome of laborious negotiations between the Workers' members and the Employers' members on certain points which had remained in abeyance. These points were the calculation of normal hours of work as an average over periods of more than one week, the length of the weekly rest period and of the annual holidays and holiday pay. The decisions which the working party made on these points, due to an excellent spirit of co-operation and good will, were reproduced in paragraphs 10, 26, 27, 31 and 34 of the draft conclusions.

58. The Subcommittee examined the draft conclusions paragraph by paragraph.

59. The Japanese and French Employers' members reserved their position with regard to paragraph 7.

60. Referring to paragraph 11, the Italian Employers' member stated that he interpreted it as recommending that in no case should the remuneration of women and young workers be greater than the remuneration of adult male workers for the same quantity of work.

61. With regard to paragraph 19, in accordance with which rest breaks were to count as normal hours of work, it was understood by agreement between the Employers' members and the Workers' members that during these breaks the personnel remained at the disposal of the employer.

62. The Kenyan Employers' member stated that he was unable to associate himself with the idea of four weeks of annual holiday as an aim to be attained.

63. On the suggestion of the Nigerian Government member, supported by the Indian, Kenyan and United States Government members and by the Nigerian and other Employers' members, the Subcommittee agreed that the clauses of the conclusions dealing with measures to be taken to reduce hours of work should be interpreted in the light of Paragraph 7 of Recommendation No. 116, which provided that these measures should take into account—

(a) the level of economic development attained and the extent to which the country is in a position to bring about a reduction in hours of work without reducing total production or productivity endangering its economic growth, the development of new industries or its competitive position in international trade, and without creating inflationary pressures which could ultimately reduce the real income of the workers;

(b) the progress achieved and which it is possible to achieve in raising productivity by the application of modern technology, automation and management techniques;

(c) the need in the case of countries still in the process of development for improving the standards of living of their peoples.

Adoption of the Draft Conclusions

64. Having noted the reservations and explanations referred to above, the Subcommittee unanimously adopted the draft conclusions annexed to the report.

65. The principles and methods referred to in the conclusions are proposed with a view to guiding those concerned with the preparation of legislation, the adoption of regulations, the issue of arbitration awards or the negotiation of collective agreements, as the case may be.

Adoption of the Report

66. The Subcommittee unanimously adopted the present report, as amended by it, at its sixth sitting on 14 October 1965.

Geneva, 14 October 1965.

(Signed) J. R. LLOYD DAVIES,
Chairman and Reporter.

Examination by the Meeting of the Report and of the Draft Conclusions concerning the Organisation of Work Schedules and Paid Holidays in Hotels, Restaurants and Similar Establishments

At its ninth plenary sitting the Meeting had before it the foregoing report and also draft conclusions concerning the organisation of work schedules and paid holidays in hotels, restaurants and similar establishments.

Mr. LLOYD DAVIES (Government delegate, United Kingdom; Chairman and Reporter of the Subcommittee on Organisation of Work Schedules and Paid Holidays) pointed out that the draft conclusions represented a wide measure of agreement on desirable conditions of work; they marked a decisive step towards the regulation of standards in this important industry in full development. In remarking that the success of the work of the Subcommittee had been very largely due to the spirit of co-operation which had prevailed in the discussions, he proposed the approval by the Meeting of the report and adoption of the draft conclusions drawn up by the Subcommittee.

Mr. LIBBERT (Government delegate, Federal Republic of Germany) said that some of the draft conclusions adopted by the Subcommittee would be difficult to apply within the framework of the present legislation in the Federal Republic of Germany. Therefore, whilst supporting the report as a whole, he wished to make certain reservations regarding paragraphs 22, 24, 26 and 27 of the draft conclusions.

Mr. BLOTEKAMP (Employers' delegate, Federal Republic of Germany) associated himself with the reservations made by the Government delegate of the Federal Republic of Germany.

Mr. CROFT (Employers' delegate, United Kingdom; Vice-Chairman of the Subcommittee on Organisation of Work Schedules and Paid Holidays), speaking in support of the approval of the report and adoption of the draft conclusions, said that the conclusions would enable the conditions which existed in the tourist industry to be further improved. He added, in particular, that it was most important that the hotel and catering trades should have sufficient trained staff.

Mr. TOWNSEND (Workers' delegate, United States; Vice-Chairman of the Subcommittee on Organisation of Work and Paid Holidays) declared that the agreement which had been achieved in the Subcommittee opened the door to the future, and he therefore warmly recommended the approval of the report and the adoption of the draft conclusions.

Mr. GEORGE (Employers' delegate, Nigeria) speaking both as representative of the Nigerian employers and as a member of the working party which had drawn up the text before the Meeting, also recommended that the Meeting approve the report and adopt the draft conclusions of the Subcommittee.

Mr. PORTMANN (Workers' delegate, Switzerland; Chairman of the Workers' group) emphasised the great importance of the document before the Meeting. It could have an extensive and favourable impact on the recruiting of qualified personnel which, at present, tended too often to go into other sectors of industry. He warmly supported approval of the report and adoption of the draft conclusions.

Mr. RAYNAERT (Workers' delegate, Belgium) recalled the cordial climate and the understanding which had obtained throughout the debates of the Subcommittee. He too recommended the approval of the report and the adoption of the draft conclusions.

The Meeting unanimously approved the report of the Subcommittee and adopted the conclusions (No. 2) concerning the organisation of work schedules and paid holidays in hotels, restaurants and similar establishments, the text of which is reproduced in the following pages, subject to the reservations indicated above and the reservations mentioned in paragraphs 59 to 63 of the report of the Subcommittee.

Conclusions (No. 2) concerning the Organisation of Work Schedules and Paid Holidays in Hotels, Restaurants and Similar Establishments [1]

The Tripartite Technical Meeting of the International Labour Organisation on Hotels, Restaurants and Similar Establishments, Convened by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office and,

Having met in Geneva from 4 to 15 October 1965,

Having examined the different methods and practices in organising work schedules and paid holidays in hotels, restaurants and similar establishments,

Having noted the principles and standards concerning hours of work and paid holidays laid down in the international instruments adopted by the International Labour Conference, in particular those set forth in the Hours of Work (Commerce and Offices) Convention, 1930, the Night Work of Young Persons (Non-Industrial Occupations) Convention, 1946, the Night Work (Women) Convention (Revised), 1948, the Weekly Rest (Commerce and Offices) Convention, 1957, the Hours of Work (Hotels, etc.) Recommendation, 1930, the Night Work of Young Persons (Non-Industrial Occupations) Recommendation, 1946, the Holidays with Pay Recommendation, 1954, the Weekly Rest (Commerce and Offices) Recommendation, 1957, and the Reduction of Hours of Work Recommendation, 1962,

Considering the special features of work in hotels, restaurants and similar establishments and also the various economic and social conditions in the different countries;

Adopts this fifteenth day of October 1965 the following conclusions:

[1] Adopted unanimously subject to the reservations made regarding paragraphs 22, 24, 26, 27 and 31.

General Considerations

1. Work schedules in hotels, restaurants and similar establishments have certain features peculiar to them because of the great diversity in the organisation of the work depending upon the kind of establishment and services provided, the categories of staff employed, and also the diverse customs and different economic conditions of countries. Nevertheless, these work schedules resemble those in other industries, particularly in industries which provide a continuous service.

2. Although the methods of organising work schedules and paid holidays must take into account the particular conditions under which work in this industry is carried out, they should aim at assuring that the personnel of hotels, restaurants and similar establishments have conditions of work comparable to those for workers in other sectors of activity.

3. These methods may be prescribed by legislation or by regulations, by collective agreements or awards, by the decisions of bipartite or tripartite bodies, or by a combination of these different methods, whichever seems to be the most suitable to the different national, regional or local conditions.

Hours of Work.

4. A characteristic of work in hotels, restaurants and similar establishments is the varying rhythm in the course of each period of work. However, this work is not and should not be considered as intermittent work. The less heavy work periods, when, however, the staff does not remain inactive, are in fact largely compensated for by the periods of intense activity. The Meeting therefore considers that " hours of work " in the industry of hotels, restaurants and similar establishments should be understood to mean all the time during which a worker is at the disposal of the employer and is not free to use this time for himself.

5. All regulations concerning hours of work in hotels, restaurants and similar establishments should aim at reconciling the periods during which the personnel has to be available to serve clients with reasonable hours of work and the necessity to satisfy the rest needs of the personnel.

6. Wherever there are as yet no provisions governing hours of work of personnel employed in hotels, restaurants and similar establishments, measures should be taken to lay down such provisions fixing standards equivalent to those in force for other sectors of economic activity, by the means best suited to the different national conditions.

7. In all cases where the hours of work for the different categories of personnel in hotels, restaurants and similar establishments are still greater than 48 hours a week, it is desirable that immediate steps be taken to reduce them to that level.

8. When hours of work are being reduced below 48 hours a week in other sectors of activity, similar measures should be envisaged and applied for the personnel of hotels, restaurants and similar establishments, in accordance with the Reduction of Hours of Work Recommendation, 1962 (No. 116), which has indicated the 40-hour week as a social standard to attain, so that the conditions of work of these workers may not be less favourable than those which apply for other workers, bearing in mind the features peculiar to hotels, restaurants and similar establishments, referred to in paragraph 1 above.

9. The reduction of hours of work in accordance with paragraphs 7 and 8 above should in no case involve a loss in wages for the workers concerned.

10. If, in view of the particular conditions in which work in the industry of hotels, restaurants and similar establishments is carried out, the normal hours of work are calculated as an average over periods of more than one week, particular care should be taken by the competent authority or body to see that the length and frequency of such periods are laid down and that a maximum limit is fixed for the hours both per day and per week.

11. Women and young workers must be protected by special reduced work schedules. These reduced work schedules shall carry the same hourly or other basic rates of pay as were applicable before the work schedules were reduced.

12. The time spent by young workers at approved training courses should be counted as part of their normal hours of work.

Overtime Work.

13. Because work in hotels, restaurants and similar establishments is mostly carried out in a standing position or in walking about, it involves considerable fatigue. For this reason overtime work should be reduced to a minimum, taking into account the limits fixed in accordance with paragraph 14 below.

14. The overtime work which the personnel might be called upon to do in special or unforeseen circumstances should be limited. In order to protect the health and well-being of the workers it is desirable that the restrictions be in respect of the number of overtime hours per week or other periods fixed in accordance with paragraph 10 above, and by fixing the absolute maximum number of hours to be worked a day.

15. Hours in excess of the normal hours of work should be paid for at a higher rate or rates than those which apply for the normal hours of work, and/or compensated for by the granting of a corresponding amount of free time increased in the same proportion as the increase in wages for overtime work.

16. It is essential that a procedure for authorising overtime work be laid down through consultation between the employer and the workers or, wherever applicable, their unions, or through the usual consultative machinery or through any other means suited to national conditions and customs.

17. Women and young workers need special protection and, therefore, should be freed from any obligation to perform overtime work.

Rest Periods

Rest Breaks.

18. In order to enable the staff of hotels, restaurants and similar establishments to relax physically and psychologically during working hours, they should be granted rest breaks at regular intervals.

19. The number and the length of these breaks to be included in the normal hours of work should be determined in taking into account the system of work organisation in each establishment and the peak periods of customers or other periods of intense activity, but in no case should any such break be less than one-quarter of an hour.

20. In addition to the breaks for relaxation, the staff of hotels, restaurants and similar establishments should be granted other breaks to enable a worker to take his meals under normal conditions.

21. The number and the length of the meal breaks should be determined in accordance with the customs and traditions of each country or area, and according to whether the meal is taken in the establishment itself or elsewhere.

22. The total length of the daily breaks during a normal working day should amount to at least one hour.

23. With regard to daily breaks in hotels, restaurants and similar establishments it is extremely desirable that, whatever the purpose of the break, there should be special provisions in respect of women and young workers.

Daily Rest.

24. As in the case of other workers, the staff of hotels, restaurants and similar establishments should be granted, between two working days, a daily uninterrupted rest period. The beginning, the length and the end of this rest depend mainly upon the starting and finishing times of the working day, the spread-over of the working day and on the method of organising the work. The rest period should not normally be less than 12 consecutive hours.

25. When setting up work schedules, account should be taken of the international standards already adopted prohibiting night work of women and young workers. With respect to young workers, these standards are contained in the provisions of the Night Work of Young Persons (Non-Industrial Occupations) Convention and Recommendation, 1946 With regard to women, it would be highly desirable that their work schedules be based on the provisions of the Night Work (Women) Convention (Revised), 1948.

Weekly Rest.

26. It is desirable that the weekly rest of workers in hotels, restaurants and similar establishments should not be less than that of workers in other industries. Toward this end, whatever may be the kind of service and the work organisation of an establishment, the staff of hotels, restaurants and similar establishments should be granted, in the course of each period of seven days, a weekly rest of one full day preceded by a reduced working day, preferably one half-day. National provisions and collective agreements should aim at procuring progressively for workers employed in this industry a weekly rest of two days, consecutive where possible.

27. The weekly rest period of women and young workers should be longer than that of adult male workers, and the aim should therefore be to extend it immediately to at least one-and-a-half days, and as rapidly as possible to two days, consecutive wherever possible.

28. In no case should the weekly rest entitlement have the effect of eliminating or lessening the daily rest period which occurs between the weekly rest period and the preceding working day.

29. Where benefits in kind are provided by the employer and are a normal part of a worker's remuneration, the worker concerned should be entitled, in respect of his weekly rest period, to cash compensation equivalent to not less than the value of these benefits in kind as established by collective agreements, by regulations of public authorities or otherwise.

Paid Holidays

Annual Paid Holidays.

30. As a part of their conditions of work, all categories of the personnel of hotels, restaurants and similar establishments should be entitled to paid annual holidays in the same way as are workers in other branches of activity.

31. Taking into account existing practices in the different countries, where the annual holiday ranges between two and four weeks, the length of the basic paid annual holiday should in no case be less than two working weeks for 12 months' continuous service. Where the present minimum length of annual holiday is two weeks, steps should be taken with a view to increasing it progressively to at least three weeks. Where the length of annual holiday is already of three weeks, the aim should be to extend it progressively to four weeks.

32. A worker whose employment ceases before the end of the full period of service for the annual holiday referred to in paragraph 31 above should be entitled to a holiday proportionate to the time he has worked and calculated on the basis of the total length of holiday due to him for 12 months' service, provided that he has worked for a minimum period to be fixed according to the conditions and customs in each country.

33. The basic annual holiday should increase in accordance with the length of service in the establishment, the age of the worker or by reason of other factors according to criteria to be determined in each country. Provided that other circumstances permit it, it is desirable that the length of service in the industry be also taken into consideration.

34. For the period of their annual holidays, workers employed in hotels, restaurants and similar establishments should be paid their normal remuneration, increased by a supplementary payment which may not be less than an amount fixed by collective agreements, by legislation or otherwise, and in accordance with benefits in kind. Consideration should be given to the practice in some countries of paying an additional amount, as a bonus or an allowance, in order to enable the workers to benefit fully from their holiday.

Public Holidays.

35. Despite the special nature of the service provided in hotels, restaurants and similar establishments, which is in several respects a continuous service and often increases in intensity on public holidays in particular, the personnel of these establishments, like other workers, should be entitled to official, religious and customary holidays without loss of wages for the free days. Where a worker is nevertheless required to work on such days, he should be entitled to a rate of pay higher than the rate for normal hours of work on a working day. Such work should only be performed in special circumstances. The number of public holidays granted to workers in hotels, restaurants and similar establishments should in no case be less than the number fixed by the legislation or other methods of regulation for other workers.

Other Leave.

36. Workers employed in hotels, restaurants and similar establishments, like workers employed in other branches and sectors of activity, should be entitled to the special paid leave which, as a generally recognised practice, is granted for particular occasions such as family or personal events, and in particular in cases of marriage, birth, anniversary or death in the family, for the exercise of civic rights and duties, or for the carrying out of short-term military obligations. Where benefits in kind are provided by the employer and are a normal part of a worker's remuneration, the worker concerned should be entitled, in respect of days of special leave, to cash compensation equivalent to not less than the value of these benefits in kind as established by collective agreements, by regulations of public authorities or otherwise.

Organisation of Work Schedules

37. The organisation of work schedules in the industry of hotels, restaurants and similar establishments, bearing in mind the nature of the services provided, should aim at assuring that the personnel of these establishments have conditions of work similar to those applying in other branches of economic activity.

38. To attain this objective, measures should be taken to eliminate overtime work and to allow for good rest periods spread over, in the wisest and most appropriate way, the day, the week and the year, so that the workers concerned may not only recuperate the physical and nervous energy which they expend at work, but may also take part in family and social life in the same way as workers in other sectors and branches of economic activity.

39. As well as observing the standards in force in respect of normal hours of work, it is particularly desirable to consider the daily maximum working hours and also the spread-over of the working day including the rest breaks.

40. Special attention should be given to the problem of night work. It is desirable to reduce night work to a strict minimum for all the personnel of hotels, restaurants and similar establishments. In organising work schedules, every effort should be made to eliminate night work of women and young workers.

41. The results sought for in organising work schedules, particularly in large and medium establishments, might be obtained, if not otherwise possible, by introducing shifts, overlapping if necessary, in order to cope with the peak hours, or by employing sufficient relief personnel wherever labour reserves make this possible.

42. In small establishments the same results might be obtained by a rational utilisation of the personnel available, either through the rotation of the personnel of several establishments or by setting up a common pool of relief staff.

43. The rotation of shifts should be worked out to ensure a fair and equitable distribution of the workload, by a rotation cycle or by alternate shifts established in advance.

44. When setting up the rotation schedules in accordance with the methods suited to each particular establishment and in consultation with the workers concerned, due account should be taken of the personal circumstances and family situation of each worker.

Methods of Implementation and Supervision

45. The effective application of the measures for a proper organisation of work schedules and holidays depends essentially upon an efficient inspection system. Therefore, for the protection of workers in hotels, restaurants and similar establishments, it is extremely important to ensure adequate inspection services, as provided for in the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947. Workers should be informed, by appropriate means, of the powers of the inspectorate and the persons responsible for the inspection.

46. In the interest of a strict application of the provisions in force, whether legislative or negotiated provisions, a close co-operation between the inspection services, unions and employers is highly desirable.

47. In order to facilitate the work of the inspection services, the main features of hours of work and holidays should be brought to the notice of the persons concerned by the posting of notices in a conspicuous place in the establishment or other suitable places. The notices should set forth, inter alia—

(a) the time at which work begins and ends;

(b) where work is carried out by shifts, the time at which each shift begins and ends;

(c) the rest breaks which are not included in the normal hours of work;

(d) the working days of the week.

Wherever workers of different nationalities are in the industry it is desirable that the notices be made available to them in their own language.

48. In addition, the employers should be required to enter in special registers the hours of work, wages and overtime of each worker, the length of annual holiday to which each worker is entitled, the dates of his actual holiday and the remuneration he receives for the holiday. The employer shall, when required to do so by a worker, supply to that worker the particulars relating to his employment which have been entered in the registers.

Consultation between Employers and Workers

49. Every effort should be made to encourage collective negotiation and joint consultation. It is essential that regular consultation on all matters of common interest with regard to conditions of work in the industry should take place between representative employers' and workers' organisations or, where such organisations do not exist, between the employers and workers concerned.

50. In any particular establishment the workers or their representatives should be consulted when the work schedules are being decided upon or are being revised.

RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED

Discussion and Adoption of the Draft Resolutions

During the eighth plenary sitting the Meeting had before it ten draft resolutions. The Chairman, in his capacity as Chairman of the Steering Committee, provided the Meeting with information regarding their origin. The Steering Committee had decided to present to the Meeting for consideration and adoption all the draft resolutions, subject to the drafting changes and amendments of substance made in them by the Committee.

1. Draft Resolution concerning the Development of Tourism and Related Industries

The Steering Committee had had before it two draft resolutions bearing on the development of tourism, one submitted by the Workers' members and the other by the Government delegates of India and Venezuela.

The Steering Committee had decided to merge these two draft resolutions and had referred the task to a small drafting committee consisting of one member from each group. The text submitted by the Workers' members had been taken as the basis for this task because it covered the most ground; in addition to the points contained in the combined text, the initial draft had dealt also with certain aspects of training, which were incorporated in another resolution on this subject which was submitted to the Meeting later. The text submitted by the Government delegates of India and Venezuela had been concerned mainly with technical assistance in the field of the hotel industry and the development of the tourist industry. The drafting committee had not only merged these texts but had also added certain other considerations and in particular paragraph 5 of Part B of the draft resolution.

There was general agreement on the purpose of these resolutions and on the combined text elaborated by the drafting committee.

Mr. PURUSHOTTAM (Government delegate, India) explained that the draft resolution recognised the role which the hotel industry and tourism could play in improving economic and social conditions in a number of countries. It also recognised the fact that in certain countries there were natural advantages which, if properly exploited, might lead to the economic and social development of those countries. He particularly mentioned that the resolution invited the Director-General to associate the I.L.O., wherever appropriate, in the technical assistance programmes undertaken by the United Nations in the field of the hotel industry and tourism development. The resolution also suggested that the experts of the I.L.O., the United Nations and specialised agencies should pay particular attention to the social problems of the industry. It invited governments to pay due attention to the needs of the tourist industry in allocating resources in their development programmes, and to associate the employers' and workers' organisations, at all levels, in drawing up and implementing these programmes; it also stressed the need for collaboration between the industrialised and the developing countries for the promotion of tourism.

Mr. CEUPPENS (Workers' delegate, Belgium; Vice-Chairman of the Meeting), speaking on behalf of the Workers' members, expressed satisfaction with the combined text and proposed its adoption.

The draft resolution was adopted unanimously.

The text of the resolution (No. 3) is reproduced below.

2. Draft Resolution concerning Freedom of Association and Trade Union Rights

The original text of this draft resolution was submitted by the Workers' members. Minor changes were introduced at the request mainly of the Employers' members because the original version, in one of the paragraphs of the preamble, indicated that certain trade union rights continued to be violated in hotels, restaurants and similar establishments.

Mr. SAWADA (Government delegate, Japan) pointed out that subparagraphs (a) and (b) of the operative paragraph of the draft resolution dealt with the question of the ratification of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), and the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), a question with which the International Labour Conference had already been concerned in one of its recent resolutions. For this reason, the Japanese delegation reserved its position on this part of the draft resolution.

Mr. CEUPPENS (Workers' delegate, Belgium; Vice-Chairman of the Meeting), having referred to the fact that the draft resolution had been slightly amended, in agreement with the other groups, so as to introduce terms having the same meaning in different parts of the world and in different languages, said that it seemed opportune to remind governments which had not yet ratified Conventions Nos. 87 and 98 to consider the matter, and to stress the importance of applying these Conventions to the personnel of hotels, restaurants and cafés at the level of the establishment.

Subject to the observations made by the Japanese Government delegation the draft resolution was adopted unanimously.

The text of the resolution (No. 4) is reproduced below.

3. Draft Resolution concerning Discrimination

The original text of this draft resolution was submitted by the Workers' group. This text referred to discrimination between men and women in the matter of remuneration, and the Employers' members had pointed out that it was not appropriate to present to the Steering Committee texts relating to remuneration because that subject was an item on the agenda of the Meeting referred to one of the technical subcommittees. On these grounds there was general agreement to delete the passages relating to equal pay for work of equal value, on the understanding that the matter would be referred to the Subcommittee on Methods of Remuneration, which dealt with the question in paragraphs 4 and 5 of its conclusions (No. 1). The remaining text was only very slightly altered, in particular by adding in the preamble a reference to age as one of the grounds for discrimination.

Mr. CEUPPENS (Workers' delegate, Belgium; Vice-Chairman of the Meeting) expressed satisfaction with the fact that the second part of the initial text of the resolution had been sent to the Subcommittee on Methods of Remuneration, which had taken it into account in its conclusions. He emphasised that the problem of discrimination was so important that it was inconceivable that an international meeting should fail to insist on the necessity of applying the Convention which dealt with the matter.

The draft resolution was adopted unanimously.

The text of the resolution (No. 5) is reproduced below.

4. Draft Resolution concerning Seasonal and Migrant Workers

The original text of the proposed resolution was submitted by the Workers' members. The Employers' members had had some doubts about the proposed text but, as a result of close and friendly co-operation between certain Employers' and Workers' members of the Steering Committee, an expanded and revised version was arrived at and resubmitted to the Steering Committee.

One of the elements in this text which was the subject of a careful revision related to the reimbursement of travel costs and appropriate guarantees in connection therewith; provisions on this matter should be included in contracts of employment, taking into account national or local customs. The terms " social tourism " or " popular tourism " occurring in the original draft were also considered. These terms were replaced by the expression " tourism for all ".

Mr. CEUPPENS (Workers' delegate, Belgium; Vice-Chairman of the Meeting) said that the terms finally used in the resolution attempted to avoid misunderstandings in different countries. He stressed the importance which, in the opinion of the Workers, the question dealt with had for the tourist industry. The staggering of the tourist seasons, in addition to bringing great economic benefits to the establishments concerned, also provided more jobs for workers and better facilities for the tourists. As far as clause (b) of subparagraph (1) of the operative paragraph was concerned, it seemed essential that seasonal workers should have the same benefits as those granted to permanent workers, in proportion to the length of their service. With regard to clause (c) he mentioned two problems—the refund of travel costs incurred by seasonal and migrant workers and the possible loss of earnings resulting from these journeys.

The draft resolution was adopted unanimously.

The text of the resolution (No. 6) is reproduced below.

5. Draft Resolution concerning the Legal Protection of Foreign Workers

The original draft of this resolution was submitted by the Workers' members. The Steering Committee made a few changes, mainly of a drafting character.

Mr. CEUPPENS (Workers' delegate, Belgium; Vice-Chairman of the Meeting) pointed out that subparagraph (a) of the operative paragraph of the draft resolution applied only to certain countries where, until administrative formalities had been complied with, the workers had no legal status or possibilities of recourse to justice. He hoped the legislation in these countries would be suitably modified so that the mere fact of being employed would carry with it a right to the protection of social legislation. In the case of subparagraph (b) it was important that foreign workers entering a new country should be furnished with all the information necessary for them to become acquainted with the formalities to be complied with, and also to know their obligations and rights.

The draft resolution was adopted unanimously.

The text of the resolution (No. 7) is reproduced below.

6. Draft Resolution concerning Young Workers

The original draft of the resolution had been submitted by the Workers' members. Objections had been raised by the Employers' group against certain criticisms embodied in two paragraphs of the preamble, which referred to alleged abuses in connection with the employment of apprentices and other young workers. The authors of the text had agreed to the deletion of these paragraphs. In addition, some relatively minor drafting changes had been made in the text.

Mr. CEUPPENS (Workers' delegate, Belgium; Vice-Chairman of the Meeting) said that the problem dealt with in this resolution represented also a somewhat special problem for the hotel industry. He considered that the principles contained in the Minimum Age (Non-Industrial Employment) Convention (Revised), 1937 (No. 60), and the Vocational Training Recommendation, 1962 (No. 117), were of particular importance for the hotel industry. The proposed resolution therefore urged, firstly, that the countries that had not yet ratified or accepted these international instruments should do so and, secondly, that even where the instruments had not yet been ratified the principles set forth in them should be effectively applied as far as possible. He also mentioned that, in the last paragraph of the draft resolution, reference was made to two points relating to apprenticeship. The first of these was covered by the very comprehensive Recommendation No. 117; in fact, it was particularly important that every hotel establishment should offer adequate guarantees if it was to have the right to take on apprentices. Unfortunately, this principle was not always applied. The second point suggested that the apprenticeship system in the establishment should be subject to a thorough supervision in which the employers' and workers' organisations should participate.

The draft resolution was adopted unanimously.

The text of the resolution (No. 8) is reproduced below.

7. Draft Resolution concerning Hygiene in Hotels, Restaurants and Similar Establishments

The original draft of the resolution was submitted by the Workers' members.

Mr. CEUPPENS (Workers' delegate, Belgium; Vice-Chairman of the Meeting) said that the resolution referred to the Hygiene (Commerce and Offices) Convention, 1964 (No. 120), and Recommendation, 1964 (No. 120), which were of particular importance for the hotel industry and even more so for the customers. The Workers' group therefore considered it desirable to urge the governments that had not yet ratified the Convention or given effect to the provisions of the Recommendation to do so. The principles contained in these international instruments should be applied in the interest of the employers, the workers and the customers in hotels, restaurants and similar establishments.

The draft resolution was adopted unanimously.

The text of the resolution (No. 9) is reproduced below.

8. Draft Resolution concerning Invalidity, Old-Age and Survivors' Pensions

The original draft of the resolution was submitted by the Workers' members. The Steering Committee had made some minor drafting changes to it.

Mr. CEUPPENS (Workers' delegate, Belgium; Vice-Chairman of the Meeting) remarked that the problem concerned only certain countries, for in many countries the problem had been solved to a large extent. However, in some countries the hotel industry was not, unfortunately, covered by social security systems concerning invalidity, old-age and survivors' pensions. It was therefore important to adopt a resolution on this question.

Mr. BLANCO-MELO (Government delegate, Mexico) proposed an amendment of the draft text to take into account the fact that some of the developing countries already had social security systems applicable to the workers concerned.

The draft resolution, thus amended, was unanimously adopted.

The text of the resolution (No. 10) is reproduced below.

9. Draft Resolution concerning the Future Action of the International Labour Organisation in respect of Hotels, Restaurants and Similar Establishments

The original text of this resolution was submitted by the Workers' members. In this text the Governing Body had been invited to take all suitable measures for the convening of further tripartite meetings on hotels, restaurants and similar establishments. Certain Employers' members had pointed out that this phrasing might lead it to be supposed that the intention was to have a succession of meetings; this would amount to establishing a new permanent Industrial Committee, which would be contrary to the clearly expressed intentions of the Governing Body.

The Workers' members had pointed out that this had not been their intention; apart from the possibility of having another meeting like the present one, smaller meetings to discuss particular problems affecting the hotel industry might be considered.

The amended draft text referring to new meetings of a tripartite character seemed sufficiently flexible to provide for various types of meetings, whether similar to the present one or in the form of smaller meetings of experts. The Indian Government delegate also wished the wording to be changed so as to conform more closely with Governing Body procedure, which was to consider requests for the holding of various types of meetings and then to make a choice between them.

Mr. CEUPPENS (Workers' delegate, Belgium; Vice-Chairman of the Meeting) drew attention to the four questions on which future study seemed desirable: (1) the social problems arising in hotels, restaurants and similar establishments in the developing countries; (2) the reasons for the instability of employment noted in all countries; (3) the problem of recruitment and employment of seasonal and migrant workers which arose in a large number of countries; (4) vocational training and promotion in view of the lack of qualified personnel in the hotel industry in the majority of countries. As it was not possible to know when future meetings might be held, the second operative paragraph of the draft resolution requested the International Labour Office to undertake studies to provide the information lacking on these subjects in case a meeting could not be held in due time.

The draft resolution was adopted unanimously.

The text of the resolution (No. 11) is reproduced below.

10. Draft Resolution concerning Vocational Training in Hotels, Restaurants and Similar Establishments

The original draft of the resolution was submitted by the Employers' members of the Steering Committee. However, the text took into account certain suggestions concerning further technical assistance in vocational training which had been previously included in another draft resolution presented by the Workers' members. Also, the Steering Committee in the course of its discussions unanimously approved the suggestion that the International Centre for Advanced Technical and Vocational Training in Turin might lend its help in this respect; this suggestion was included in subparagraph (b) of the operative paragraph of the draft resolution.

Mr. MILLER (Employers' Adviser, United Kingdom) stressed the great importance attached by the Employers' delegates to this resolution. While the Workers' members had considered placing the question on the agenda of a future meeting, the Employers' members considered that it should be dealt with sooner, and by experts.

Mr. OBIMBO (Government delegate, Kenya) proposed an amendment in subparagraph (b) to make the resolution refer to existing hotel schools instead of to European hotel schools.

The draft resolution, as amended, was adopted unanimously.

The text of the resolution (No. 12) is reproduced below.

Text of the Resolutions Adopted

Resolution (No. 3) concerning the Development of Tourism and Related Industries [1]

The Tripartite Technical Meeting on Hotels, Restaurants and Similar Establishments,

Having met in Geneva from 4 to 15 October 1965,

Considering the rapid development of tourism, including hotels, restaurants, cafés and similar establishments, during recent years, and in particular the expansion in popular tourism,

Considering the contribution these industries can make to economic development and especially to the improvement of the balance of payments, particularly in developing countries which often enjoy exceptional natural advantages for tourism,

Considering that the development of tourism and related industries can also contribute to the improvement of the standard of living of the workers concerned and of the population in general,

Considering the mutual obligations of employers and workers to their clientèle and to tourism, and the desire of customers to enjoy adequate services and facilities during their periods of rest and leisure,

Considering that these industries are essential elements in providing a real welcome to visitors, especially those from abroad;

Adopts this fourteenth day of October 1965 the following resolution:

A. The Governing Body of the International Labour Office is invited to request the Director-General—

(a) to take suitable measures in order to continue and expand, in consultation, where appropriate, with the United Nations, the technical assistance programme of the International Labour Organisation in the field of the hotel and related industries, particularly with a view to helping developing countries to improve their tourist industries;

(b) to associate the International Labour Organisation, where appropriate, with the work of the United Nations undertaken with a view to the development of tourism and related activities;

(c) to see that international experts working in this field pay particular attention to the social problems of this industry, in consultation with the workers' and employers' organisations concerned.

B. The Governing Body of the International Labour Office is also invited to request the Director-General to bring to the attention of the governments concerned and, through them, the organisations of employers and workers concerned, the following considerations:

1. It is advisable to ensure that, with regard to hotels and tourism, economic development proceeds on an orderly, progressive and fair basis, within the framework of international planning of the available resources and funds for investment and that, in over-all economic development plans, an appropriate part is reserved to the hotel and related industries, which should be considered as an essential element of the infrastructure of a developing country, as well as to tourism.

2. In submitting requests for technical co-operation to the United Nations and the specialised agencies, the governments concerned should give appropriate priority to projects aiming at the development of tourism and related industries.

[1] Adopted unanimously.

3. Governments should associate, at all levels, the employers' and workers' organisations concerned in drawing up and implementing development plans on tourism and related industries.

4. A more extensive collaboration should be envisaged between industrialised and developing countries in the application of the principles of tripartite or bipartite co-operation concerning the social problems of tourism and related industries.

5. Particular attention should be paid, with a view to easing burdensome manual tasks and without thereby endangering security of employment, to the improvement, by modern techniques, of methods and systems of performing work in hotels and related industries.

Resolution (No. 4) concerning Freedom of Association and Trade Union Rights [1]

The Tripartite Technical Meeting of the International Labour Organisation on Hotels, Restaurants and Similar Establishments,

Having met in Geneva from 4 to 15 October 1965,

Considering the fundamental principles of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), and of the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98),

Considering the importance of respecting rights relating to freedom of association and trade union rights as regards persons employed in hotels, restaurants and similar establishments;

Adopts this fourteenth day of October 1965 the following resolution:

The Governing Body of the International Labour Office is invited to request the Director-General—

(a) to appeal to member States of the International Labour Organisation that have not yet ratified the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), and the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), to do so;

(b) to draw the attention of the governments of all member States, and through them that of the employers' and workers' organisations concerned, to the need to apply the provisions of these Conventions to persons employed in hotels, restaurants, cafés and similar establishments, particularly at the level of the undertaking, and to ensure the protection of workers who are members or representatives of trade unions in these establishments;

(c) to urge the governments and the employers' and workers' organisations concerned to denounce all cases where these Conventions are not effectively respected and implemented as regards persons employed in hotels, restaurants, cafés and similar establishments, making use, where appropriate, of the procedures laid down for the application of international labour Conventions and for the examination of alleged violations of freedom of association.

Resolution (No. 5) concerning Discrimination [1]

The Tripartite Technical Meeting of the International Labour Organisation on Hotels, Restaurants and Similar Establishments,

Having met in Geneva from 4 to 15 October 1965,

Considering that in some countries there still exists in hotels, restaurants, cafés and similar establishments discrimination in respect of employment, occupation, vocational training and remuneration on the basis of race, colour, sex, age, religion, political and trade union opinion, national extraction or social origin;

Adopts this fourteenth day of October 1965 the following resolution:

[1] Adopted unanimously.

The Governing Body of the International Labour Office is invited to request the Director-General to draw the attention of governments, and through them, of the employers' and workers' organisations concerned, to the importance of ensuring that the principles laid down by the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111), as well as by the Recommendation dealing with the same subject, are fully and effectively implemented with regard to the staff of hotels, restaurants, cafés and similar establishments.

Resolution (No. 6) concerning Seasonal and Migrant Workers [1]

The Tripartite Technical Meeting of the International Labour Organisation on Hotels, Restaurants and Similar Establishments,

Having met in Geneva from 4 to 15 October 1965,

Considering that in many countries seasonal and migrant workers in hotels, restaurants, cafés and similar establishments are placed in several respects in a particularly unfavourable position in comparison with permanent workers, especially as regards hours of work, weekly rest, holidays with pay, payments of travel costs between home and the place of work and social security benefits;

Adopts this fourteenth day of October 1965 the following resolution:

The Governing Body of the International Labour Office is invited—

(1) to request the Director-General to draw the attention of the governments of all member States, and through them of the employers' and workers' organisations concerned, to the desirability—

(a) of promoting the extension of the seasons for tourism by advancing the beginning or delaying the end of the various entertainments offered to the visitors, by advertising campaigns out of season and by facilitating by all appropriate means the development of tourism for all, for example by reducing fares;

(b) of applying to the workers concerned, in proportion to their period of employment, all social benefits enjoyed by permanent workers, particularly as regards holidays with pay, public holidays, weekly rest, retirement pensions and unemployment benefit, board and lodging;

(c) of taking all possible steps to provide in contracts of employment for the reimbursement of travel costs between the home of the workers concerned and their place of work, within the country and abroad, as well as possible loss of earnings, subject to appropriate guarantees and taking into account any national or local customs which may exist; and

(2) to request the Director-General to undertake studies on the problems relating to seasonal and migrant workers in hotels, restaurants and similar establishments and to publish information thereon.

Resolution (No. 7) concerning the Legal Protection of Foreign Workers [1]

The Tripartite Technical Meeting of the International Labour Organisation on Hotels, Restaurants and Similar Establishments,

Having met in Geneva from 4 to 15 October 1965,

Considering that in certain cases workers have been refused legal protection that would normally follow from their contracts of employment because certain administrative or official formalities have not been fulfilled;

Adopts this fourteenth day of October 1965 the following resolution:

The Governing Body of the International Labour Office is invited to request the Director-General to urge governments—

(a) to take measures to ensure that, where a foreign worker is, or has effectively been, working in an hotel, restaurant, café or similar establishment without the compulsory administrative or official formalities having been fulfilled, this fact should not prevent the worker from being able to have legal recourse with a view to securing the protection resulting from the social legislation of the country concerned;

(b) to take measures to ensure that foreign workers are informed about the main provisions of laws, regulations or collective agreements affecting them and are provided with the necessary information concerning official agencies and organisations of employers and workers.

Resolution (No. 8) concerning Young Workers [1]

The Tripartite Technical Meeting of the International Labour Organisation on Hotels, Restaurants and Similar Establishments,

Having met in Geneva from 4 to 15 October 1965,

Considering the special need for protecting the health of young workers engaged in hotels, restaurants, cafés and similar establishments and to ensure their full physical, moral and intellectual development, enabling them in particular to enjoy the benefit of a sufficiently high standard of education,

Considering that, in a number of cases, young workers are employed at an age lower than that established by the Minimum Age (Non-Industrial Employment) Convention (Revised), 1937 (No. 60);

Adopts this fourteenth day of October 1965 the following resolution:

The Governing Body of the International Labour Office is invited to request the Director-General—

(a) to remind the governments of member States which have not yet done so of the importance of ratifying the Minimum Age (Non-Industrial Employment) Convention (Revised), 1937 (No. 60), and to give effect to the Vocational Training Recommendation, 1962 (No. 117);

(b) to remind the governments of member States, and through them the organisations of employers and workers concerned, of the importance of effectively applying the principles set out in Convention No. 60 and the provisions of Recommendation No. 117 as regards persons employed in hotels, restaurants, cafés and similar establishments;

(c) to emphasise especially the necessity of recognising for apprenticeship purposes only approved undertakings which offer the necessary guarantees and of ensuring a thorough supervision over apprenticeship with the participation of employers', workers' and other organisations concerned.

Resolution (No. 9) concerning Hygiene in Hotels, Restaurants and Similar Establishments [1]

The Tripartite Technical Meeting of the International Labour Organisation on Hotels, Restaurants and Similar Establishments,

Having met in Geneva from 4 to 15 October 1965,

Having noted with satisfaction the adoption by the International Labour Conference, at its 48th Session in 1964, of the Hygiene (Commerce and Offices) Convention (No. 120), and the Hygiene (Commerce and Offices) Recommendation (No. 120),

Considering that Convention No. 120 as well as Recommendation No. 120 are applicable to hotels, restaurants and similar establishments;

Adopts this fourteenth day of October 1965 the following resolution:

The Governing Body of the International Labour Office is invited to request the Director-General—

(1) to draw the attention of the governments of member States of the International Labour Organisation which have not yet done so to the importance of ratifying as soon as possible Convention No. 120 and giving effect to the provisions of Recommendation No. 120;

[1] Adopted unanimously.

(2) to draw the attention of the governments of all member States and, through them, of the employers' and workers' organisations concerned, to the importance of applying the principles contained in Convention No. 120, and the provisions of Recommendation No. 120, to persons employed in hotels, restaurants, cafés and similar establishments.

Resolution (No. 10) concerning Invalidity, Old-Age and Survivors' Pensions [1]

The Tripartite Technical Meeting of the International Labour Organisation on Hotels, Restaurants and Similar Establishments,

Having met in Geneva from 4 to 15 October 1965,

Considering that, in a great number of countries, including especially some developing countries, there still exists no legal system of invalidity, old-age and survivors' pensions applicable to the workers in hotels, restaurants, cafés and similar establishments, and that in those countries where such systems exist the latter are often inadequate;

Adopts this fourteenth day of October 1965 the following resolution:

The Governing Body of the International Labour Office is invited to request the Director-General to draw the attention of the governments of the member States of the International Labour Organisation and, through them, of the employers' and workers' organisations concerned, to the importance of ensuring that—

(a) the legal system of invalidity, old-age and survivors' pensions be extended to cover workers in hotels, restaurants, cafés and similar establishments, in the countries where these workers do not yet benefit from such systems; and

(b) the total amount of legal and other pensions be sufficient to ensure to old and invalid workers and to survivors at least a normal standard of living.

Resolution (No. 11) concerning the Future Action of the International Labour Organisation concerning Hotels, Restaurants and Similar Establishments [1]

The Tripartite Technical Meeting of the International Labour Organisation on Hotels, Restaurants and Similar Establishments,

Having met in Geneva from 4 to 15 October 1965;

Adopts this fourteenth day of October 1965 the following resolution:

The Governing Body of the International Labour Office is invited—

(1) to consider the possibility of convening, at the earliest possible date, further meetings of a tripartite character on hotels, restaurants and similar establishments, which should consider, among other matters—

(a) the social problems arising in these establishments in the developing countries;

(b) the reasons for the instability of employment in these establishments;

(c) the conditions of recruitment and employment of seasonal and migrant workers;

(d) vocational training and promotion;

(2) to request the Director-General in the meantime to undertake studies on the above-mentioned subjects and to publish the results thereof.

Resolution (No. 12) concerning Vocational Training in Hotels, Restaurants and Similar Establishments [1]

The Tripartite Technical Meeting of the International Labour Organisation on Hotels, Restaurants and Similar Establishments,

Having met in Geneva from 4 to 15 October 1965,

Considering the importance of vocational training and further training of skilled workers and supervisory and managerial staff, who are needed in a great many countries in order that hotels, restaurants and similar establishments may develop in such a way as to satisfy customers;

Adopts this fourteenth day of October 1965 the following resolution:

The Governing Body of the International Labour Office is invited to request the Director-General—

(a) to draw the attention of governments and, through them, of employers' and workers' organisations and other institutions concerned, to the need for providing and developing, in all countries, and especially in those where the hotel and related industries are expanding, facilities for training workers for all categories of skilled occupations, including management, and for the exchange of students and trainees;

(b) in the meantime, to invite the International Centre for Advanced Technical and Vocational Training in Turin to consider the possibility of arriving at agreements with existing hotel schools with a view to enabling trainees from developing countries to complete their training in these institutions;

(c) to continue to give a favourable response to any further requests for technical assistance received in this field;

(d) to consider the possibility of including in the programme of work of the Office a meeting of experts drawn in part from employer and worker circles, on such vocational training.

Preparatory Technical Conference on Fishermen's Questions

(Geneva, 18-28 October 1965)

Note on the General Discussion, Reports of the Working Parties and Proposed International Instruments Adopted

In accordance with a decision taken by the Governing Body at its 159th Session (June-July 1964), the Preparatory Technical Conference on Fishermen's Questions was held in Geneva from 18 to 28 October 1965, with the following agenda:

I. Accommodation on board fishing vessels.

II. Vocational training of fishermen.

III. Fishermen's certificates of competency.

The Conference was attended by 93 delegates and advisers from 15 countries, comprising 37 Government, 30 Employers' and 26 Workers' delegates and advisers; all delegations except three were tripartite. Three additional countries were represented by observers. The following States Members of the Organisation were represented at the Conference:

Belgium.	Japan.	Rumania.
Canada.	Netherlands.	Spain.
Denmark.	Norway.	U.S.S.R.
France.	Peru.	United Arab Republic.
Federal Republic of Germany.	Philippines.	United Kingdom.
India.	Poland.	United States.

The Food and Agriculture Organisation of the United Nations and the Intergovernmental Maritime Consultative Organisation were represented at the Conference, as well as the following non-governmental international organisations: International Confederation of Free Trade Unions [1], International Federation of Christians Trade Unions [1], International Federation of Christian Trade Unions of Transport Workers, International Organisation of Employers [1], International Transport Workers' Federation and World Federation of Trade Unions.[1]

The Governing Body was represented by a delegation consisting of Mr. M. AOKI for the Government group, Mr. F. A. P. MURO DE NADAL for the Employers' group, and Mr. G. PONGAULT for the Workers' group.

The Conference unanimously elected as its President Captain J. G. HUTCHISON (Government delegate, Canada), and as its Vice-Presidents Mr. V. P. RAPPAI (Government delegate, U.S.S.R.), Mr. H. A. H. B. KRANENBURG (Employers' delegate, Netherlands) and Mr. E. HAUGEN (Workers' delegate, Norway).

The Conference appointed a Steering Committee composed of four members and a number of deputy members from each group, in addition to the ex officio members—the President, the three Vice-Presidents and the representatives of the Governing Body. Captain Hutchison was elected Chairman of the Steering Committee.

The Conference had before it three reports prepared by the Office, one for each of the items on the agenda. These documents contained law and practice reports on the relevant subjects, as well as the comments and suggestions made by governments in respect of the conclusions reached by the Committee on Conditions of Work in the Fishing Industry (Geneva, December 1962), and specific proposals for international instruments relating to accommodation on board fishing vessels, vocational training of fishermen and fishermen's certificates of competency.

The Conference decided to consider successively in plenary sitting the three items on the agenda, and to appoint two working parties whose terms of reference were to formulate, in the light of the discussions in plenary sittings and for submission to plenary sittings of the Conference, conclusions relating to the three items.

Admiral J. BARRETO ALVÁN (Government delegate, Peru), was appointed Chairman of the Working Party on Accommodation on board Fishing Vessels, while Mr. T. D. RICE (Government adviser, United States) was appointed Chairman of the Working Party on Vocational Training and Certificates of Competency.

The Conference held 11 plenary sittings. One was devoted to opening speeches and the election of officers; two to the discussion of accommodation on board fishing vessels; three to the discussion of vocational training of fishermen; two to the discussion of fishermen's certificates of competency; and three to examination of the reports and conclusions proposed by the working parties.

This note gives a summary of the substantive discussions in plenary sitting and reproduces the reports of the two working parties as well as the texts of the conclusions concerning the training of fishermen, the conclusions concerning accommodation on board fishing vessels and the conclusions concerning fishermen's certificates of competency, which were adopted by the Conference.

DISCUSSION IN PLENARY SITTING

OPENING SPEECHES

In opening the Conference the SECRETARY-GENERAL briefly reviewed the earlier action in respect of fishermen taken by the I.L.O., and recalled the conclusions concerning the questions to be discussed which had been formulated by the Committee on Conditions of Work in the Fishing Industry in 1962. He stressed the importance of these questions to fishermen at this time, and said that the fishing industry had in recent years assumed great and steadily increasing significance as a major producer of food for the rapidly growing population of the world. Much emphasis was being laid, in both developing and highly industrialised countries, on the need to exploit more efficiently and rationally the resources of the sea. The techical and scientific developments in fishing had resulted in basic changes in the conditions of work of fishermen, their skill requirements and the training they needed. It was essential that these changes should be fully reflected in any instruments recommended for adoption by the International Labour Conference, as such instruments must be technically correct and so designed as to render the kind of service to members of the I.L.O. which they had the right to expect.

The Secretary-General pointed out that the discussion at the Conference would take the place of the first discussion by the International Labour Conference of the item concerning fishermen's questions. He suggested that each of the three questions might be discussed in turn in plenary sitting and subsequently referred to working parties which would be responsible for formulating conclusions on each question for submission to the Conference.

General Discussion

Accommodation on Board Fishing Vessels

The Government delegate of Japan said that his Government had in recent years taken several measures to improve accommodation on board fishing vessels. It had in particular encouraged in various ways the owners of vessels of over 100 tons to modernise and improve crew accommodation on board their vessels. However, it would be difficult to implement in Japan certain provisions of the proposed instrument.

The United Kingdom Government delegate said that there were no statutory regulations in his country governing crew accommodation, but that certain rules and instructions existed under the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894. Some other instructions had recently been prepared but were not yet in force. He pointed out that the parameter used in the United Kingdom for the application of regulations of this kind was the length of the vessel; New Zealand and Finland used the same system, and he considered that this criterion could usefully be applied in the proposed instrument. The limit could be set at 80 feet. The instrument should contain a clause making it applicable to smaller vessels when practicable. He then made several comments on the individual Articles of the proposed text.

The Government delegate of the U.S.S.R. referred to the difficult conditions of fishermen in many countries, and to the shortage of new entrants to the industry, which showed the dissatisfaction which fishermen felt with regard to their conditions of work on board fishing vessels. There was a great need to create more normal conditions of work for fishermen, and he recommended that the proposed instrument should take the form of a Convention, which should apply to fishing vessels of more than 25 tons.

The United States Government delegate suggested that the proposed instrument should be a Recommendation, and that it should apply to vessels of 100 tons and above. He also suggested a number of drafting changes, including improvements in definitions.

The Government delegate of India expressed a preference for laying down length and not tonnage as the criterion for vessels to be covered by the proposed instrument. He felt, however, that it would be even better if both criteria could be applied, and suggested a minimum of 80 feet and 100 tons for this purpose.

The Employers' delegates stated that they were in favour of improving conditions of employment of fishermen, and that they would support an international instrument on accommodation on board fishing vessels provided the objectives of this instrument were within their reach. The present situation in respect of accommodation on board fishing vessels, in the opinion of various Employers' delegates, varied greatly owing not only to the varying degree of development on the fishing industry in the countries concerned, but also to the prevailing climatic conditions and the type of fishing in which vessels were engaged.

The Belgian Workers' delegate emphasised that the proposed instrument should take the form of a Convention, which would make it mandatory for the various countries to bring about the desired changes. The workers had been waiting for action in this field for many years, and they considered that the time had now come for concrete action. The Workers' delegates were not prepared to accept a tonnage limit which would not be realistic and which would have the effect of excluding a great proportion of fishing vessels from the application of the instrument.

Several Workers' delegates put forward amendments to the text. The French Workers' delegate made suggestions aiming at improving the comfort of the crew. He stressed the increasing danger of noise on board fishing vessels, and suggested that noise levels should be reduced to a maximum of 90 to 100 decibels in workplaces and 60 to 70 in sleeping quarters or messrooms. The Workers' group as a whole, in view of the fact that studies at present being carried out on the effect of noise on the hearing faculty were still incomplete, reserved the right to refer to this question again at the 50th Session of the International Labour Conference.

The United States Workers' delegate, while indicating that in his country the standards laid down in the proposed instrument were largely surpassed, stressed that the establishment of minimum standards at an international level would have beneficial effects. Productivity in the fishing industry was increasing; an improvement in conditions of fishermen could not fail to increase productivity further. He made certain detailed proposals in connection with several Articles of the proposed text, and suggested that the instrument should apply to vessels of over 25 tons.

The Norwegian Workers' delegate indicated that in many countries there was a tendency to abandon the fishing industry, and that recruitment was not satisfactory. Good conditions in regard to accommodation would certainly help to attract and to retain fishermen in their trade.

The representative of the Intergovernmental Maritime Consultative Organisation stated that very few provisions of the proposed instrument were concerned with the safety of life at sea, which was the subject in which I.M.C.O. was really interested. He felt that length instead of tonnage should be used as the measurement in determining the scope of the instrument, and made certain other suggestions aiming at improving the text from a safety point of view.

At the end of the general discussion the Conference decided to entrust the Working Party on Accommodation on board Fishing Vessels with the responsibility of drawing up conclusions concerning accommodation on board fishing vessels for submission to the Conference.

Vocational Training of Fishermen

During the discussion on vocational training of fishermen various Government delegates described the situation prevailing in their respective countries and the manner in which governmental assistance was being provided. The Canadian Government delegate pointed out that, in addition to giving financial assistance, the Government had recently conducted a functional analysis of the different types of work in the fishing industry as a means of assisting fishermen's training schemes to develop training in those fields which were most urgently in need of it.

The Government delegate of the United Kingdom said that in his country the formal training of fishermen was primarily directed towards the attainment of navigational skills to ensure safety at sea, but the Government was in the process of modernising legislation concerning training schemes for various industries. High standards should, in his view, be recommended for the training of skippers and mates, but as regards training in fishing techniques he favoured a flexible approach in order to take account of the varying conditions and practices involved. The United Kingdom Government was in general agreement with the proposals concerning fishermen's training drafted by the I.L.O., and considered that they would form a suitable basis for an international instrument.

The Government delegate of India stated that his Government provided very little assistance to fishermen's training programmes, and that there was a wide gap between the standards of fishermen's training in developing countries and those in advanced nations. He stressed the importance of international co-operation designed to assist developing nations in improving and expanding their fishermen's training schemes, and expressed himself in favour of an international instrument in the form of a Recommendation which would help to promote greater uniformity among the fishermen's training systems of different countries. While in general he approved of the proposals formulated by the I.L.O., he felt that the text might be made more flexible on certain points to enhance its applicability to developing countries.

The U.S.S.R. Government delegate was in favour of an international instrument as drafted by the I.L.O. He emphasised the importance of vocational training in the fishing industry being brought up to the level of that in other industries. Legislation in the U.S.S.R. ensured vocational training for all fishermen, and a state committee on training co-ordinated the activities of the various training establishments. Both regular and advanced training was provided by numerous institutions located in different regions of the country, and in addition there were correspondence courses for fishermen. The U.S.S.R. participated actively in international co-operation in the vocational training of fishermen in developing countries, and undertook the training in the Soviet Union of foreign nationals from many countries.

The Government delegate of France described the developments which had occurred in fishermen's training in recent years and which, in the interest of safety at sea, had been greatly spurred by the demand for better-trained fishermen. The policy adopted in 1963 required basic training for certain fishermen recruits, and involved separating fishery schools from navigation schools and co-ordinating the activities of public and private training centres. An advanced fishery school was being planned, and a national committee of examiners was to be established.

The Government delegates of Japan and the United States supported the proposed conclusions on fishermen's training contained in the I.L.O. report, but made a number of observations on specific parts of the conclusions, either as they related to current practice in their countries or as suggestions for improvement of the scope or clarity of the text.

The Employers' delegates were in general agreement with the principles of fishermen's training as outlined by the I.L.O., which they felt should be embodied in a Recommendation. The Peruvian Employers' delegate stressed the importance of the proper training of fishermen for the protection of the large investment in the fishing industry of his country, and pointed out that the conclusions concerning fishermen's training must take full account of the needs of the various countries.

The United States Employers' delegate emphasised the complexity of vocational training of fishermen and the joint responsibility of employers, workers and governments for the development of training schemes corresponding to the particular needs of the various countries. He pointed out that the conclusions of the Conference must be flexible.

The U.S.S.R. Employers' delegate suggested certain drafting changes to the proposed conclusions, chiefly for purposes of clarity, while the United Kingdom Employers' delegate emphasised that the text should fully recognise the difference in operating conditions which existed among the various countries and regions of the world.

There was general agreement among the Workers' delegates that, in the interest of promoting safety at sea and to satisfy the demand for more highly qualified fishermen, there was a need for establishing international standards concerning the vocational training of fishermen. They felt that the proposed conclusions formed a suitable basis for discussing the possible contents of an international instrument.

The United States Workers' delegate suggested a number of modifications to the text, designed to stress the need to assist trainees to reach their highest productive and earning capacity, the importance to developing countries of training schemes for fishermen, and the usefulness of regional collaboration between groups of countries for the purpose of developing training programmes for fishermen.

The French Workers' delegate said that working conditions in the fishing industry must be improved if the industry were to overcome the serious manpower shortage which had developed in recent years. He attached great importance to the formal training of fishermen and the establishment of a certificate of competency for skilled fishermen, and asserted that an international instrument concerning the training of fishermen should take the form of a Convention.

The representative of the Food and Agriculture Organisation of the United Nations explained that his organisation had in the past 14 years sent 100 experts to various countries throughout the world to assist governments in establishing adequate training programmes for fishermen and in introducing modern fishing techniques and equipment. He reported on a recent international seminar on fishermen's training which had been sponsored by F.A.O. in collaboration with the Government of the U.S.S.R.

The representative of the Intergovernmental Maritime Consultative Organisation referred to the Convention on Safety of Life at Sea, 1960, and suggested that the competent authorities in the various countries should prescribe a minimum amount of instruction in subjects related to the safe navigation of fishing vessels, and that these authorities should consider the recommendations embodied in the report of the Joint I.L.O.-I.M.C.O. Committee on the Training of Seafarers in the Use of Aids to Navigation and Other Devices.

Upon completion of the general discussion on vocational training in plenary sitting, the Conference decided to assign to the Working Party on Vocational Training and Certificates of Competency the task of drawing up conclusions concerning the training of fishermen for submission to the Conference.

Fishermen's Certificates of Competency

The delegates who took part in the discussion in plenary sitting on this item expressed general agreement with the points for discussion prepared by the I.L.O. Several Government and Employers' delegates, however, felt that it would be undesirable in an international instrument to make provision for the certification of able fishermen, as proposed by the I.L.O., on the ground that the justification for such a certificate rested on matters other than safety considerations.

The Government delegate from Norway suggested that the instrument should also cover certificates of competency for cooks on fishing vessels of over 100 tons, and the Government delegate from Japan explained that in Japan certificates for merchant seamen and fishermen were issued under the same regulations and were in fact identical. The proposed international instrument should cover only officers' certificates, and certification in fishing skills should be dealt with in the instrument on vocational training of fishermen.

The Government adviser of the Federal Republic of Germany and the United Kingdom Government delegate, who proposed various amendments, pointed out that international standards for fishermen's certificates should, because of their relationship to safety at sea, be laid down in a Convention which should be flexible enough to encourage ratification by countries already having legislation covering the subject. The Government adviser from France and the Belgian and U.S.S.R. Government delegates were also in favour of a Convention for fishermen's certificates of competency, whereas the Government delegate from the United States stated that he could not accept a Convention but was prepared to approve a Recommendation which should apply to vessels of 200 gross tons and over.

The Government adviser from Canada emphasised that a Recommendation would be the most suitable form for an international instrument covering certificates of competency for fishermen. He explained that Canada had certification regulations for engineers of fishing vessels and was presently introducing regulations to cover also skippers and mates of fishing vessels. It was to be hoped that the development of regulations for Canadian fishermen would be assisted by the proposals concerning certificates adopted by the Conference.

The Government delegate of India considered that there was no special advantage in establishing an international instrument pertaining to fishermen's certificates of competency. He was, however, not opposed to the establishment of such standards provided they were made applicable only to mechanised fishing vessels and did not require certificates of competency for skilled fishermen and cooks.

The Employers' delegates in general supported the viewpoint that any international instrument covering certificates of competency for fishermen should be flexibly framed so as to facilitate implementation and ratification by the various countries.

The Netherlands and Japanese Employers' delegates recommended that the proposed international instrument should be a Recommendation, and pointed out that there appeared to be no need for the establishment of a certificate of competency as able fisherman.

The Workers' delegates emphasised the desirability of establishing a flexible international instrument laying down detailed standards for certificates of competency for deck and engineering officers of fishing vessels, and they supported the proposals drawn up by the I.L.O. The Workers' delegate of the Federal Republic of Germany and the Japanese Workers' delegate said that the instrument should be a Convention, which should be capable of attracting general acceptance by the various fishing nations.

The French Workers' delegate suggested that the instrument should cover also certificates for able fishermen and boatswains of fishing vessels. The establishment of a certificate for cooks of fishing vessels was proposed by the Workers' delegate of the Federal Republic of Germany and the Japanese Workers' delegate.

The representative of the Intergovernmental Maritime Consultative Organisation stressed the importance of establishing certificates of competency for fishermen, and suggested that regulations concerning the certification of skippers and mates should be based upon the length of fishing vessels, and for engineers on the horsepower of propulsion machinery. Account must be taken of the waters in which vessels operate and other conditions, and should also require that radio operators of fishing vessels be certificated.

Texts Adopted by the Conference

At its last plenary sitting on 28 October 1965 the Conference noted that the texts concerning vocational training of fishermen, accommodation on board fishing vessels and fishermen's certificates of competency, which it had adopted unanimously, would serve as a basis for draft international instruments to be considered by the International Labour Conference at its 50th Session in 1966. The Conference emphasised that the discussion next year of these questions would be greatly facilitated by the inclusion in national delegations of representatives of all sides of the fishing industry, and invited the member States of the I.L.O. to give all possible consideration to this question when determining the composition of their delegations to the 50th Session of the International Labour Conference.

Closing Speeches

Appreciation for the fine results of the Conference and for the excellent and painstaking work of all concerned with the preparation and organisation of, and participation in, the Conference was warmly expressed by the various members, including Admiral Barreto Alván (Government delegate, Peru), Mr. Cobley (Employers' delegate, United Kingdom), Mr. Haugen (Workers' delegate, Norway; Vice-President of the Conference), Mr. Kranenburg (Employers' delegate, Netherlands; Vice-President of the Conference), Mr. Rappai (Government delegate, U.S.S.R.; Vice-President of the Conference), Mr. Rice (Government Adviser, United States), Mr. Vandensteen (Government delegate, Belgium) and Mr. Wiemers (Workers' delegate, Federal Republic of Germany). Particular mention was made of the helpful technical knowledge furnished by the Government members, of the understanding shown by the Employers' members regarding the problems of fishermen, and of the evident desire of all the members of the Conference to reach agreement with a view to achieving a favourable evolution of social and working conditions in the fishing industry. Mr. Rappai expressed the hope that the International Labour Organisation would continue its work in this field by giving attention to other important fishermen's questions which remained to be examined, such as social security, holidays and safety techniques on fishing vessels.

The Secretary-General joined in the expression of appreciation for the fruitful work of the Conference. Its efforts would not fail to produce favourable effects not only on the population of the world as a whole, but also on world economy. The populations of the world were finding it increasingly necessary to give attention to fish as a food, and the sea was a source of nourishment which had hardly been opened up as yet. Fishermen should no longer be known as the " forgotten workers ", and the time would certainly come when their importance would be fully recognised. Measures taken to improve the conditions of fishermen contributed to solving the acute problem of feeding the populations of the world. Such measures had been provided for in the conclusions adopted by the Conference. It was now necessary to put these measures into practice.

He thanked all of the members for the work accomplished and for the spirit of co-operation which had pervaded the Conference throughout its duration.

The President thanked all of the members for their understanding and co-operation throughout the Conference. These had been important factors in the success of the Conference. Recalling that the finest words of praise in the maritime profession were " well done! ", he felt that the excellent work of the Conference merited the accolade " very well done, indeed! "

REPORTS AND CONCLUSIONS ADOPTED

Report of the Working Party on Accommodation on board Fishing Vessels

Composition and Officers

1. The Working Party on Accommodation on board Fishing Vessels was composed as follows:

Government members :

Titular members :

India: Mr. Purushottam.
Netherlands: Mr. Berlage.
Spain: Mr. Curiel Barragán.
U.S.S.R.: Mr. Rappai.

Deputy members :

Belgium: Mr. VANCRAEYNEST.
France: Mr. RENÉ.
Federal Republic of Germany: Mr. FETTBACK.
Norway: Mr. SALVESEN.
United Kingdom: Mr. WILSON.
United States: Mr. STOLTING.

Employers' members :

Titular members :

Mr. COBLEY (United Kingdom).
Mr. GENSCHOW (Federal Republic of Germany).
Substitute: Mr. OTTE.
Mr. RUTHFORD (United States).
Substitute: Mr. HARDEE.
Mr. YOSHIDA (Japan).
Substitute: Mr. GOTO.

Deputy members :

Mr. KRANENBURG (Netherlands).
Mr. BOZA BARRIOS (Peru).
Mr. SMITH (Canada).
Mr. BESNARD (France).

Workers' members :

Titular members :

Mr. DEKEYZER (Belgium).
Mr. HAUGEN (Norway).
Mr. BALINGER (United States).
Mr. NAKANO (Japan).

Deputy members :

Mr. CHUYEV (U.S.S.R.).
Mr. ANNERL (Federal Republic of Germany).
Mr. DE SARCILLY (France).
Mr. BUQUET (Netherlands).

2. The Chairman of the Working Party was Admiral J. BARRETO ALVÁN (Government member, Peru) who was elected also as Reporter. Mr. KRANENBURG and Mr. DEKEYZER were elected Employers' and Workers' Vice-Chairmen respectively.

3. The Working Party decided when discussing the proposed conclusions on accommodation on board fishing vessels drawn up by the I.L.O. to take into consideration the comments and observations that had been made in the course of the general discussion by the Conference on crew accommodation on board fishing vessels.

EXAMINATION OF THE PROPOSED CONCLUSIONS ON ACCOMMODATION ON BOARD FISHING VESSELS

4. The Working Party discussed in the first instance whether the proposed instrument should take the form of a Convention or a Recommendation. It was recalled that the 1962 Committee on Conditions of Work in the Fishing Industry had felt that it was not competent to decide which form its conclusions should take. The Workers' group was in favour of a Convention. Various Government members pointed out that since the instrument concerning seafarers was a Convention, fishermen should also be covered by a Convention. Some Government members also stated that an instrument having the form of a Convention was more likely to be effective.

5. On the other hand, a few Government members indicated their preference for an instrument having the form of a Recommendation. These members felt that a Convention was difficult to apply, especially in less developed countries and in countries where the fishing industry was in its early stages.

6. After the Employers' group had indicated that it would not object to a Convention the Working Party decided to suggest to the Conference that the proposed instrument should take the form of a Convention.

Discussion of the Proposed Convention Article by Article

Article 1.

Paragraph 1.

7. After a discussion as to whether the expression "maritime fishing in salt waters" was to be interpreted as covering fishing in the Great Lakes of Canada and the United States, the Working Party adopted paragraph 1 without change on the understanding that such interpretation would be left to the countries concerned.

Paragraph 2.

8. Paragraph 2 was adopted by the Working Party without change.

Paragraph 3.

9. The Working Party started the examination of paragraph 3 by discussing the minimum tonnage of the fishing vessels to which the proposed Convention should apply. The Workers' members indicated that they were in favour of a limit of 25 tons but might accept a limit of 50 tons if this would facilitate an agreement. The Government member for the United Kingdom pointed out that the legislation in force in his country used, as a parameter for the application of the various regulations to fishing vessels, the length of the vessel and not the tonnage. This seemed to be more precise. He stressed the fact that New Zealand and Finland used the same parameter. For the purpose of this Convention he suggested that the length of 80 feet should be considered as the minimum length of vessels to which the proposed Convention should apply. He added that a vessel of 80 feet would be equivalent to a vessel of approximately 100 tons.

10. Several Government members supported the proposal that the proposed Convention should not apply to fishing vessels of less than 100 tons. The Government member for the U.S.S.R. stated that he was in favour of a limit of 25 tons, while the Government members for Belgium and Norway felt that the minimum tonnage should be 50. The member from Norway agreed, however, that it might be necessary to make an exception in the case of certain provisions whose application would be difficult on smaller vessels of between 50 and 100 tons.

11. The Workers' members pointed out that if the proposed Convention were to apply only to fishing vessels of more than 100 tons the great majority of fishing vessels would be excluded from its application, even in the developed countries. However, in order to enable the Working Party to proceed with the discussion of the text they suggested that the discussion should proceed on the assumption that the tonnage limit would be fixed at 75. The Working Party agreed to this suggestion.

12. The Workers' members proposed that a clause be added to subparagraph (b) to the effect that the application of the proposed Convention to vessels between 25 and 75 tons should be determined by the competent authority after consultation with representatives of the two sides of the industry.

13. The Workers' members proposed that fishery research and protection vessels should be excluded from the application of the Convention, and a subparagraph to this effect was added to the text.

14. The Working Party discussed whether factory ships were to be covered by the provisions of the proposed Convention. The Government member for the United Kingdom indicated that the legislation in his country made a distinction between factory ships which were engaged in catching fish and factory ships which only processed it. In the former case factory ships were considered as fishing vessels while in the latter case they were considered as foreign-going cargo vessels, and therefore covered by the Accommodation of Crews Convention (Revised), 1949 (No. 92), as well as by load-line regulations and the safety regulations for foreign-going ships.

15. The Employers' members felt that vessels receiving catch from other vessels should not be considered as fishing vessels.

16. The Assistant Secretary-General explained that whaling and sealing vessels had been excluded from the application of Convention No. 92 because it had been felt, at Seattle, that a considerable number of those employed on board such vessels did not belong to the seafaring profession and were comparable to factory workers, for whom special provisions were made.

17. The Working Party agreed that factory ships, whether they were actually engaged in catching fish or only in processing it, should be covered by an instrument concerning crew accommodation and that it would be for national legislation to determine whether such ships should be covered by legislation adopted in accordance with Convention No. 92 or with the present proposed Convention.

Paragraph 4.

18. The Employers' members suggested that the words " 24 hours " appearing in the first sentence of paragraph 4 should be replaced by " three days ". After a discussion the Working Party agreed that the provisions listed in paragraph 4 should not apply to ships and boats which normally remain at sea for periods of less than 36 hours.

19. The Government member for the United Kingdom suggested that the words " remain at sea " be replaced by the words " remain away from their home port "; in fact ships frequently touched port every day and yet were away from their home port for long periods. The Working Party agreed to this suggestion.

Paragraph 5.

20. The Workers' member for the U.S.S.R. suggested that the words " bona fide " appearing in this paragraph as well as in a number of other places in the text, when they were used to qualify fishermen's organisations, should be deleted. The Working Party agreed to this suggestion.

Article 2.

21. The Working Party adopted Article 2 without change.

Article 3.

22. The Working Party agreed to reverse the order of subparagraphs (c) and (d). With this change Article 3 was adopted.

Article 4.

23. The Government member for the United Kingdom felt that paragraph 2 of Article 4 was unnecessarily complicated and suggested its deletion. However, to take into account the cases mentioned in paragraph 2 in which crew accommodation of existing vessels is altered or reconstructed, he suggested a corresponding addition to paragraph 1. The Working Party agreed to this suggestion.

Article 5.

24. The Government member for the United Kingdom proposed the addition of a subparagraph which would enable the competent authority to inspect fishing vessels at any time at its discretion. The legal adviser pointed out that the present text did not mean that the competent authority was not entitled to carry out inspections at any time. It only meant that the competent authority was under the obligation to carry out an inspection in the three cases mentioned in Article 5.

Article 6.

Paragraph 1.

25. The French Workers' member proposed the addition of a sentence to paragraph 1 laying down the maximum noise level in working places and in sleeping rooms. These noise levels should not be more than 100 decibels in working places and 70 decibels in sleeping rooms. In addition, provision should be made to minimise vibration.

26. The Government member for France informed the Working Party that in his country studies were being carried out to determine the level at which noise becomes harmful. Although certain results had already been achieved, it was nevertheless clear that the findings were not yet final and it was therefore preferable not to include any figure in this instrument. The Government member for Belgium concurred with this opinion and added that a study carried out in Germany in 1961 had revealed that the maximum noise level should be of 90 din/phon in the engine room and of 70 din/phon in the crew quarters and on the bridge. The noise was measured in din/phon which seemed to express in a better way the effect of noise on human beings. As far as the vibrations were concerned the main sources on board ship were the main and auxiliary motors and the propeller. While it was possible to minimise this effect on auxiliary motors, it was much more complicated to do so in the case of the main motor and the propeller.

27. In view of the fact that the research on this subject was still incomplete, the Workers' group agreed to withdraw the proposed addition. They reserved, however, the right to bring this matter up again in 1966 at the 50th Session of the Conference when it was hoped that further study would make it possible to provide for a precise maximum level of noise.

New Paragraph 2.

28. On the proposal of the Government member for the United Kingdom the Working Party agreed to add a paragraph 2 to provide for emergency escape from crew accommodation where necessary.

Paragraph 3 (Old Paragraph 2).

29. Paragraph 3 was adopted with the addition of the words " and fish-meal rooms " after the words " fish holds ".

Paragraphs 4 to 12 (Old Paragraphs 3 to 11).

30. Paragraphs 4 to 12 were adopted without change.

New Paragraph 13.

31. On the proposal of the Government member of the United Kingdom the Working Party agreed to add a new paragraph 13 to provide that overhead exposed decks over crew accommodation should be sheathed.

Paragraphs 14 and 15 (Old Paragraphs 12 and 13).

32. The Working Party adopted paragraphs 14 and 15 without change.

New Paragraph 16.

33. On the proposal of the Government member of the United States a new paragraph 16 was added to provide for the protection of crew accommodation against the admission of flies and other insects.

Article 7.

Paragraphs 1 and 2.

34. The Working Party adopted paragraphs 1 and 2 without change.

Paragraph 3.

35. The Japanese Workers' member suggested that specific mention should be made in this paragraph of the Persian Gulf, although geographically it was not entirely included in the tropics.

36. After a discussion the Working Party agreed that after the words " in the tropics " the words " and other areas with similar climatic conditions " should be added.

37. On the proposal of the Peruvian Employers' member the Working Party also agreed to add after " shall " the words " as required by such conditions ".

Paragraphs 4 and 5.

38. The Working Party adopted paragraphs 4 and 5 without change.

Article 8.

Paragraphs 1 and 2.

39. The Working Party adopted paragraphs 1 and 2 without change.

Paragraph 3.

40. The Japanese Employers' member proposed the addition of a sentence to the effect that open fires should be permitted when an adequate protection was provided. The Workers' members opposed this proposal, which was finally withdrawn. The French Workers' member indicated that in his country heating was permitted by means of butane or propane gas. On ships of less than 200 tons coal stoves are also permitted. Various members expressed their opinion on this matter with reference to the legislation in force in individual countries. The Working Party eventually agreed to adopt paragraph 3 without change.

Paragraph 4.

41. The Working Party adopted paragraph 4 without change.

Paragraph 5.

42. The representative of the Intergovernmental Maritime Consultative Organisation suggested a change to paragraph 5 which would embody safety measures in connection with heating apparatus. The Working Party agreed to the suggested change.

Article 9.

Paragraph 1.

43. The Government observer for Denmark proposed a new drafting of the last sentence of paragraph 1 to take care of the cases in which it is not possible, for safety reasons, to provide natural lighting. The Working Party, after consideration of this proposal, agreed that the text as suggested should be maintained.

Paragraphs 2 and 3.

44. The Working Party adopted paragraphs 2 and 3 without change.

Paragraph 4.

45. On the proposal of the United States Workers' member the Working Party agreed to add, at the end of paragraph 4, the words " in addition to the normal lighting of the cabin ".

Article 10.

Paragraph 1.

46. The Workers' members recognised that in modern trawlers fishing from the stern was more and more extensively used and that when this system was applied crew accommodation could not be located aft. They suggested, however, that sleeping rooms should be located in the forepart of the vessel only in exceptional circumstances. Therefore they supported the present text of paragraph 1.

47. The Employers' member from the Federal Republic of Germany pointed out that in modern trawlers the fishing operations were carried out from the stern and that the middle section of the fishing vessels was occupied by the engine room, the filleting machine, the refrigerated rooms, etc. The location of the crew accommodation was, therefore, in these modern ships, normally in the forepart. It was therefore perhaps opportune to change the text of this draft in order to provide that the location of the sleeping rooms in the forepart of the ship should be considered as normal and not exceptional as in the present text. It was clear that the accommodation should not be in any circumstances forward of the collision bulkhead.

48. The Employers' group supported this proposal while the Workers' group opposed it. The United Kingdom Government member indicated that the location of the crew accommodation in the forepart of the ship should be exceptional not only for safety reasons, but also for the comfort of the crew. The Working Party concluded that the present wording of the text gave the competent authority adequate scope to take into account the coming into use of stern trawlers which necessitated the location forward of the accommodation, and paragraph 1 was therefore adopted in its original text.

Paragraph 2.

49. The United Kingdom Government member expressed the opinion that paragraph 2 provided for too many categories of fishing vessels and that a clear-cut provision, without so many distinctions of sizes of ships, would be preferable. He therefore suggested that on all ships a clear space area of 1 square metre, or 10 square feet, should be provided for every member of the crew. By clear space he meant space not occupied by berths or lockers. He objected to 14 square feet or 1.3 square metres as being in excess of the area laid down for ships under Convention No. 92.

50. The U.S.S.R. Government member indicated that, according to the regulations in force in his country, the space at the disposal of every member of the crew was 4 cubic metres in larger vessels and 3.5 cubic metres in the smaller vessels. The floor area corresponding to this volume depended, of course, on the height of the cabin, which was normally 1.85 metres.

51. After a discussion, the Working Party agreed to maintain the original drafting of paragraph 2.

Paragraphs 3 and 4.

52. Paragraphs 3 and 4 were adopted without change.

Paragraph 5.

53. Following a suggestion by the United Kingdom Employers' member that the drafting of paragraph 5 should be changed to provide for a greater clarity of the terms " officers in charge of a department " and " officers in charge of a watch ", the Workers' group suggested the deletion of the entire subparagraph (a) of this paragraph, and the deletion of the word " Other " at the beginning of the following subparagraph. The Working Party agreed to this suggestion.

54. The Workers' group proposed the deletion of clause (iii) of subparagraph (b) (formerly (c)). They considered that a provision which permitted the accommodation of ten persons in the same cabin should not appear in an international instrument at the present time. The Working Party agreed and paragraph 5 was adopted with this change together with the consequential change in clause (ii) and also with a minor amendment suggested by the Government member for India.

Paragraphs 6 to 8.

55. The Working Party adopted paragraphs 6 to 8 without change.

Paragraph 9.

56. The United Kingdom Employers' member suggested that, when the berths were placed along the vessel's side and next to a sidelight, double tiers should be permitted if the sidelight could not be opened. The United Kingdom Government member pointed out that a berth placed against a sidelight prevented light from entering the cabin and therefore should be prohibited. He added that for safety reasons berths should not be placed along the ship's side. He did not suggest, however, that this provision should be included in the proposed text. After a discussion, the Working Party adopted the text of paragraph 9 without change.

Paragraph 10.

57. The United States Workers' member proposed that there should be at least 2 feet 6 inches clearance from the top of the lower berth to the bottom of the upper berth. It was indicated that the present text provided for approximately the same distance, and paragraph 10 was therefore adopted by the Working Party without change.

Paragraph 11.

58. The U.S.S.R. Government member observed that the regulations in force in his country prescribed that the inside dimensions of the berths should be 190 by 70 centimetres. The United Kingdom Government member suggested the deletion of the words " whenever possible " from the text. The Assistant Secretary-General explained that the words had been inserted in the text of the corresponding paragraph of Convention No. 92 because in certain smaller vessels it was necessary to permit the berths to be narrower at the foot in order to suit the form of the cabin. After this explanation paragraph 11 was adopted by the Working Party in its original form.

Paragraphs 12 to 16.

59. Paragraphs 12 to 16 were adopted without change.

Paragraph 17.

60. Following observations from the United Kingdom Government member that the minimum dimensions provided for clothes lockers were difficult to apply in smaller vessels, the Workers' members agreed that paragraph 17 could be drafted in a simpler way to let the competent authority determine the specifications of the lockers.

Paragraph 18.

61. The Working Party adopted paragraph 18 without change.

Paragraph 19.

62. On the suggestion of the Government member for France the words " or to harbour vermin " were added at the end of paragraph 19.

Paragraph 20.

63. The English text of paragraph 20 was amended to bring it into conformity with the French text and to add the words " wherever practicable ".

Paragraphs 21 to 23.

64. Paragraphs 21 to 23 were adopted by the Working Party without change.

Article 11.

Paragraph 1.

65. The United States Workers' member suggested that a separate mess room should be provided on vessels carrying a crew of more than four persons, instead of ten as is indicated in the proposed text. After a discussion, it was agreed that the present text should be maintained but a sentence added to the effect that wherever possible a separate mess room should be provided also in vessels carrying a smaller crew. Furthermore, a sentence was added, on the proposal of the United Kingdom Government member, to the effect that, where it was impracticable to have a separate mess room, this might be combined with sleeping accommodation.

Paragraph 2.

66. On the proposal of the United States Workers' member the word " shall " was replaced by " may ". With this change, paragraph 2 was adopted.

Paragraphs 3 to 7.

67. Paragraphs 3 to 7 were adopted without change.

New Paragraph 8.

68. On the proposal of the Japanese Workers' member the addition of a new paragraph was agreed upon to provide for the possibility of using mess rooms as recreation rooms.

Article 12.

Paragraphs 1 and 2.

69. Paragraphs 1 and 2 were adopted without change.

Paragraph 3.

70. On the proposal of the United Kingdom Government member the Working Party agreed to add the words " wherever practicable " to the first sentence of paragraph 3.

Paragraph 4.

71. The United States Workers' member proposed the substitution of the word " fresh " by the word " potable ". The U.S.S.R. Government member opposed this amendment on the grounds that it was not necessary to have potable water for washing purposes. Paragraph 4 was adopted without change.

Paragraph 5.

72. The Working Party adopted paragraph 5 without change.

Paragraph 6.

73. On the proposal of the United Kingdom Government member the word " compartments " was added after the words " water closet ".

Paragraph 7.

74. Paragraph 7 was adopted without change.

Paragraph 8.

75. On the proposal of the Netherlands Government member paragraph 8 was amended to provide that soil pipes and waste pipes should not pass through fresh water or drinking water tanks. A sentence was also added to paragraph 8 providing that soil pipes and waste pipes should not pass overhead in mess rooms and sleeping accommodation.

Paragraph 9.

76. Paragraph 9 was adopted without change.

Paragraph 10.

77. The words " in all vessels " were, on the proposal of the United Kingdom Government member, deleted from paragraph 10, which was adopted.

Paragraph 11.

78. Paragraph 11 was adopted without change.

Paragraph 12.

79. On the proposal of the United States Workers' member paragraph 12 was amended to provide that the compartment for hanging clothes should be separate from water closets.

Article 13.

Paragraph 1.

80. A discussion took place to decide whether paragraph 1 should prescribe a sick cabin, a sick bay or a hospital. The Working Party agreed to use the word " cabin " instead of " sick berth " as used in the original text.

81. The Working Party also agreed on the proposal of the United Kingdom Government member to add a sentence to provide for a sick bay on ships over 500 tons.

Paragraph 2.

82. The Working Party also agreed, on the suggestion of the Workers' group, to add, in paragraph 2, a reference to the Ships' Medicine Chests Recommendation, 1958, and the Medical Advice at Sea Recommendation, 1958.

Article 14.

83. The Working Party adopted Article 14 without change.

Article 15.

84. The Working Party adopted Article 15 without change.

Article 16.

Paragraph 1.

85. On the proposal of the United Kingdom Government member the Working Party agreed to add a sentence to paragraph 1 to the effect that a separate galley should be provided wherever practicable.

Paragraph 2.

86. Paragraph 2 was adopted without change.

Paragraph 3.

87. On the proposal of the Assistant Secretary-General the Working Party agreed to amend paragraph 3 to prescribe that sinks should be of rust-proof material. After discussion, the Working Party agreed to replace the word " Fresh " by the word " Drinking " before " water ".

Paragraph 4.

88. The Working Party adopted paragraph 4 without change.

New Paragraph 5.

89. The Working Party agreed, on the proposal of the Workers' group, to add a new paragraph prescribing arrangements for the preservation of fresh foodstuffs by refrigeration or other low-temperature storage space and for the storage of dry foodstuffs.

New Paragraph 6.

90. On the proposal of the French Workers' member the Working Party agreed to add a new paragraph prescribing that gas containers should not be kept in the galley.

Article 17.

91. The Working Party adopted the whole of Article 17, with the deletion of the words " bona fide ", appearing in paragraphs 2, 3 and 4, as agreed before.

Article 18.

92. The Working Party adopted Article 18 without change.

New Tonnage Measurements

93. The United Kingdom Government member indicated that in the near future tween-decked larger ships might have two gross tonnage measurements, as a result of the coming into force of recent I.M.C.O. Recommendations. It had already been decided that for purposes of safety regulations the larger tonnage figures would apply.

Adoption of Report and Proposed Conclusions

94. The Working Party unanimously adopted the report and proposed conclusions on accommodation on board fishing vessels.

Geneva, 27 October 1965.

(Signed) J. Barreto Alván,
Chairman and Reporter.

Examination by the Conference of the Report of the Working Party on Accommodation on board Fishing Vessels and of the Proposed Conclusions Annexed Thereto

At its tenth plenary sitting the Conference had before it the foregoing report, together with the proposed conclusions on accommodation on board fishing vessels.

In submitting the report and the proposed conclusions Admiral Barreto Alván (Government delegate, Peru; Chairman and Reporter of the Working Party on Accommodation on board Fishing Vessels) thanked members of the Working Party for the assistance which they had rendered him in his dual capacity as Chairman and Reporter of the Working Party. The extensive preparatory work which the Committee on Conditions of Work in the Fishing Industry had undertaken on this matter in 1962 had been brought to a full and successful conclusion in the present report. Their work would be of great benefit to fishermen everywhere.

Mr. Dekeyzer (Workers' delegate, Belgium; Vice-Chairman of the Working Party on Accommodation on board Fishing Vessels) proposed, on behalf of the Workers' group, an amendment to Article 1, paragraph 4, of the proposed conclusions to the effect that the words " and in which the crew does not live on board " should be added to this paragraph. This phrase was identical to that which had been deleted by the Working Party, at the suggestion of the United Kingdom Government delegate.

Mr. Cobley (Employers' delegate, United Kingdom) accepted the amendment proposed by the Workers' group. On behalf of the Employers' group, he proposed a further amendment to Article 1, paragraph 4, to the effect that the words " their home " should be deleted.

Mr. Wilson (Government delegate, United Kingdom) accepted the amendment proposed by the Employers' group and that proposed by the Workers' group. He considered that the words added to Article 1, paragraph 4, were superfluous, but this matter could always be raised at the forthcoming session of the International Labour Conference.

The amendments proposed by the Workers' group and the Employers' group were unanimously adopted.

Mr. Dekeyzer, on behalf of the Workers' group, thanked Admiral Barreto Alván for his guidance and assistance in bringing their discussions to a successful conclusion. The Workers' group also wished to express its gratitude to the Employers' group and the Government group for the comprehension with which they had received the views of the Workers' group.

The international instrument on accommodation on board fishing vessels, which would take the form of a Convention, would have a wide impact on the future of the fishing industry. The Workers' representatives were concerned not only with the well-being of their members but also with the perpetuation of the fishing industry. The instrument would help to attract young men to the fishing industry, which was at present experiencing manning difficulties, and thus increase the productivity of the industry and its contribution to the well-being of mankind.

Mr. Cobley congratulated Admiral Barreto Alván on the way in which he had brought the Working Party safely through its deliberations. He also expressed the appreciation of the Employers' group for the spirit of understanding in which its views had been considered by the Workers' group and the Government group.

Mr. Wilson stated that the United Kingdom Government, whilst it accepted the report, was disappointed that length had not been adopted as the parameter instead of tonnage. He hoped that national delegations would give further consideration to this matter before the next session of the International Labour Conference, particularly since large trawlers would soon have two gross tonnages. He drew attention to the fact that in Article 10, paragraph 2, the sleeping area prescribed for vessels over 500 tons was in excess of that laid down for merchant ships in Convention No. 92. The United Kingdom Government would raise this question at the forthcoming session of the International Labour Conference.

The Report of the Working Party on Accommodation on board Fishing Vessels was adopted unanimously.

The proposed conclusions on accommodation on board fishing vessels were unanimously adopted as amended. The text of the conclusions is reproduced below.

Conclusions concerning Accommodation on board Fishing Vessels

1. There should be an international instrument concerning accommodation on board fishing vessels.

2. The international instrument should take the form of an international Convention.

3. The international instrument should include the following provisions:

PART I. GENERAL PROVISIONS

Article 1

1. This Convention applies to all sea-going, mechanically-propelled ships and boats, of any nature whatsoever, whether publicly or privately owned, which are engaged in maritime fishing in salt waters and are registered in a territory for which this Convention is in force.

2. National laws or regulations shall determine what ships and boats are to be regarded as sea-going ships and boats for the purpose of this Convention.

3. This Convention does not apply to—

(a) ships and boats normally employed in fishing for sport or recreation;

(b) ships and boats of less than 75 tons: Provided that the Convention may be applied to vessels between 25 and 75 tons where the competent authority determines, after consultation with the fishing vessel owners' and fishermen's organisations, where such exist, that this is reasonable and practicable;

(c) ships and boats primarily propelled by sail but having auxiliary engines;

(d) ships and boats engaged in whaling or similar pursuits;

(e) fishery research and protection vessels.

4. The following provisions of this Convention do not apply to ships and boats which normally remain away from port for periods of less than 36 hours and in which the crew does not live on board:

Article 9, paragraph 4;

Article 10;

Article 11;

Article 12;

Article 14:

Provided that in such ships and boats adequate sanitary installations as well as messing and cooking facilities and accommodation for resting shall be provided.

5. The provisions of Part III of this Convention may be varied in the case of any ships or boats if the competent authority is satisfied, after consultation with the fishing vessel owners' and fishermen's organisations, where such exist, that the variations to be made provide corresponding advantages as a result of which the over-all conditions are no less favourable than those that would result from the full application of the provisions of the Convention; particulars of all such variations shall be communicated by the Member to the Director-General of the International Labour Office, who shall notify the Members of the International Labour Organisation.

Article 2

In this Convention—

(a) the term " fishing vessel " or " vessel " means a ship or boat to which the Convention applies;

(b) the term " tons " means gross registered tons;

(c) the term " officer " means a person other than a master ranked as an officer by national laws or regulations, or, in the absence of any relevant laws or regulations, by collective agreement or custom;

(d) the term " rating " means a member of the crew other than an officer;

(e) the term " crew accommodation " includes such sleeping rooms, mess rooms and sanitary accommodation as are provided for the use of the crew;

(f) the term " prescribed " means prescribed by the national laws or regulations, or by the competent authority;

(g) the term " approved " means approved by the competent authority;

(h) the term " re-registered " means re-registered on the occasion of the simultaneous change in the territory of registration and ownership of the vessel.

Article 3

1. Each Member for which this Convention is in force undertakes to maintain in force laws or regulations which ensure the application of the provisions of Parts II, III and IV of this Convention.

2. The laws or regulations shall—

(a) require the competent authority to bring them to the notice of all persons concerned;

(b) define the persons responsible for compliance therewith;

(c) provide for the maintenance of a system of inspection adequate to ensure effective enforcement;

(d) prescribe adequate penalties for any violation thereof;

(e) require the competent authority to consult the fishing vessel owners' and fishermen's organisations, where such exist, in regard to the framing of regulations, and to collaborate as far as practicable, with such parties in the administration thereof.

Part II. Planning and Control of Crew Accommodation

Article 4

Before the construction of a fishing vessel is begun, and before the crew accommodation of an existing vessel is altered or reconstructed, detailed plans of, and information concerning, the accommodation shall be submitted to the competent authority for approval.

Article 5

On every occasion when—

(a) a fishing vessel is registered or re-registered;

(b) the crew accommodation of a vessel has been substantially altered or reconstructed; or

(c) complaint has been made to the competent authority in the prescribed manner and in time to prevent any delay to the vessel by a recognised trade union of fishermen representing all or part of the crew or by a prescribed number or proportion of the members of the crew of the vessel that the crew accommodation is not in compliance with the terms of this Convention; the competent authority shall inspect the vessel and satisfy itself that the crew accommodation complies with the requirements of the laws and regulations.

Part III. Crew Accommodation Requirements

Article 6

1. The location, means of access, structure and arrangement in relation to other spaces of crew accommodation shall be such as to ensure adequate security, protection against weather and sea and insulation from heat or cold, undue noise or effluvia from other spaces.

2. Emergency escapes shall be provided from all crew accommodation spaces, as necessary.

3. Every effort shall be made to exclude direct openings into sleeping rooms from fish holds and fish-meal rooms, from spaces for machinery, from galleys, lamp and paint rooms or from engine, deck and other bulk store rooms, drying rooms, communal wash places or water closets. That part of the bulkhead separating such places from sleeping rooms and external bulkheads shall be efficiently constructed of steel or other approved substance and shall be watertight and gastight.

4. External bulkheads of sleeping rooms and mess rooms shall be adequately insulated. All machinery casings and all boundary bulkheads of galleys and other spaces in which heat is produced shall be adequately insulated when there is a possibility of resulting heat effects in adjoining accommodation or passageways. Care should also be taken to provide protection from heat effects of steam and/or hot-water service pipes.

5. Internal bulkheads shall be of approved material which is not likely to harbour vermin.

6. Sleeping rooms, mess rooms, recreation rooms and alleyways in the crew accommodation space shall be adequately insulated to prevent condensation or over-heating.

7. Main steam and exhaust pipes for winches and similar gear shall, whenever technically possible, not pass through crew accommodation or through alleyways leading to crew accommodation; where they do pass through such accommodation or alleyways they shall be adequately insulated and encased.

8. Inside panelling or sheathing shall be of material with a surface easily kept clean.

9. The competent authority shall decide to what extent fire-prevention or fire-retarding measures shall be required to be taken in the construction of the accommodation.

10. The wall surface and deckheads in sleeping rooms and mess rooms shall be capable of being easily kept clean and, if painted, shall be light in colour; lime wash must not be used.

11. The wall surface shall be renewed or restored as necessary.

12. The decks in all crew accommodation shall be of approved material and construction and shall provide a surface impervious to damp and easily kept clean.

13. Overhead exposed decks over crew accommodation shall be sheathed with wood or equivalent insulation.

14. Where the floorings are of composition the joinings with sides shall be rounded to avoid crevices.

15. Sufficient drainage shall be provided.

16. All practicable measures shall be taken to protect crew accommodation against the admission of flies and similar insects.

Article 7

1. Sleeping rooms and mess rooms shall be adequately ventilated.

2. The system of ventilation shall be controlled so as to maintain the air in a satisfactory condition and to ensure a sufficiency of air movement in all conditions of weather and climate.

3. Vessels regularly engaged on voyages in the tropics and other areas with similar climatic conditions shall, as required by such conditions, be equipped with both mechanical means of ventilation and electric fans: Provided that one only of these means need be adopted in spaces where this ensures satisfactory ventilation.

4. Vessels engaged elsewhere shall be equipped with either mechanical means of ventilation or electric fans. The competent authority may exempt vessels normally employed in the cold waters of the northern or southern hemispheres from this requirement.

5. Power for the operation of the aids to ventilation required by paragraphs 3 and 4 shall, when practicable, be available at all times when the crew is living or working on board and conditions so require.

Article 8

1. An adequate system of heating the crew accommodation shall be provided as required by climatic conditions.

2. The heating system shall, when practicable, be in operation at all times when the crew is living or working on board and conditions require its use.

3. Heating by means of open fires shall be prohibited.

4. The heating system shall be capable of maintaining the temperature in crew accommodation at a satisfactory level under normal conditions of weather and climate likely to be met with on service; the competent authority shall prescribe the standard to be provided.

5. Radiators and other heating apparatus shall be fitted with safety devices and shall be so placed and, where necessary, insulated as to avoid risk of fire or danger or discomfort to the occupants.

Article 9

1. All crew spaces shall be adequately lighted. The minimum standard for natural lighting in living rooms shall be such as to permit a person with normal vision to read on a clear day an ordinary newspaper in any part of the space available for free movement. When it is not possible to provide adequate natural lighting, artificial lighting of the above minimum standard shall be provided.

2. As far as practicable, in all vessels electric lights shall be provided in the crew accommodation. If there are not two independent sources of electricity for lighting, additional lighting shall be provided by properly constructed lamps or lighting apparatus for emergency use.

3. Artificial lighting shall be so disposed as to give maximum benefit to the occupants of the room.

4. Adequate reading light shall be provided for every berth in addition to the normal lighting of the cabin.

Article 10

1. Sleeping rooms shall be situated amidships or aft; the competent authority may, in particular cases, if the size, type or intended service of the vessel renders any other location unreasonable or impracticable, permit the location of sleeping rooms in the forepart of the vessel, but in no case forward of the collision bulkhead.

2. The floor area per person of sleeping rooms, excluding space occupied by berths and lockers, shall not be less than—

In vessels of			25	tons	but	below	50	tons:	0.5	m^2	(5.4	ft^2)
,,	,,	,,	50	,,	,,	,,	100	,,	0.75	,,	(8.1	,,)
,,	,,	,,	100	,,	,,	,,	250	,,	0.9	,,	(9.7	,,)
,,	,,	,,	250	,,	,,	,,	500	,,	1.0	,,	(10.8	,,)
,,	,,	,,	500	,,	or	over:			1.3	,,	(14.0	,,)

3. The clear head room in the crew sleeping rooms shall, wherever possible, be not less than 6 feet 3 inches (190 centimetres).

4. There shall be a sufficient number of sleeping rooms to provide a separate room or rooms for each department: Provided that the competent authority may relax this requirement in the case of small vessels.

5. The number of persons allowed to occupy sleeping rooms shall not exceed the following maxima:

(a) officers: one person per room wherever possible, and in no case more than two;

(b) ratings: two or three persons per room wherever possible, and in no case more than the following:

(i) in vessels of 250 tons and over, not more than four men;

(ii) in vessels under 250 tons, not more than six men:

Provided that the competent authority may permit exceptions in particular cases, if the size, type or intended service of the vessel make these requirements unreasonable or impracticable.

6. The maximum number of persons to be accommodated in any sleeping room shall be indelibly and legibly marked in some place in the room where it can conveniently be seen.

7. Members of the crew shall be provided with individual berths.

8. Berths shall not be placed side by side in such a way that access to one berth can be obtained only over another.

9. Berths shall not be arranged in tiers of more than two; in the case of berths placed along the vessel's side, there shall be only a single tier where a sidelight is situated above a berth.

10. The lower berth in a double tier shall not be less than 12 inches (30 centimetres) above the floor; the upper berth shall be placed approximately midway between the bottom of the lower berth and the lower side of the deckhead beams.

11. The minimum inside dimensions of a berth shall wherever practicable be 6 feet 3 inches by 2 feet 3 inches (190 centimetres by 68 centimetres).

12. The framework and the lee-board, if any, of a berth shall be of approved material, hard, smooth and not likely to corrode or to harbour vermin.

13. If tubular frames are used for the construction of berths, they shall be completely sealed and without perforations which would give access to vermin.

14. Each berth shall be fitted with a spring bottom or a spring mattress and with a mattress of approved material. Stuffing of straw or other material likely to harbour vermin shall not be used.

15. When one berth is placed over another a dust-proof bottom of wood, canvas or other suitable material shall be fitted beneath the spring bottom of the upper berth.

16. Sleeping rooms shall be so planned and equipped as to ensure reasonable comfort for the occupants and to facilitate tidiness.

17. The furniture shall include a clothes locker for each occupant fitted with a hasp for a padlock. The competent authority shall ensure that such locker is as commodious as practicable.

18. Each sleeping room shall be provided with a table or desk, which may be of the fixed dropleaf or slide-out type, and with comfortable seating accommodation as necessary.

19. The furniture shall be of smooth, hard material not liable to warp or corrode, or to harbour vermin.

20. The furniture shall include a drawer or equivalent space for each occupant which shall, wherever practicable, be not less than 2 cubic feet (0.056 cubic metre).

21. Sleeping rooms shall be fitted with curtains for the sidelights.

22. Sleeping rooms shall be fitted with a mirror, small cabinets for toilet requisites, a book rack and a sufficient number of coat hooks.

23. As far as practicable, berthing of crew members shall be so arranged that watches are separated and that no day-men share a room with watch-keepers.

Article 11

1. Mess-room accommodation separate from sleeping quarters shall be provided in all vessels carrying a crew of more than ten persons. Wherever possible it shall be provided also in vessels carrying a smaller crew; if, however, this is impracticable, the mess room may be combined with the sleeping accommodation.

2. In vessels engaged in high-sea fishing and carrying a crew of more than 20, separate mess-room accommodation may be provided for master and officers.

3. The dimensions and equipment of each mess room shall be sufficient for the number of persons likely to use it at any one time.

4. Mess rooms shall be equipped with tables and approved seats sufficient for the number of persons likely to use them at any one time.

5. Mess rooms shall be as close as practicable to the galley.

6. Where available pantries are not accessible to mess rooms, adequate lockers for mess utensils and proper facilities for washing utensils shall be provided.

7. The tops of tables and seats should be of damp-resisting material, without cracks and capable of being easily cleaned.

8. Wherever practicable mess rooms shall be planned, furnished, and equipped to give recreational facilities.

Article 12

1. Sufficient sanitary accommodation, including wash basins and tub and/or shower baths, shall be provided in all vessels.

2. National laws or regulations shall prescribe the allocation of water closets to various groups, subject to the provisions of paragraph 3 of this Article.

3. Sanitary facilities for all members of the crew who do not occupy rooms to which private facilities are attached shall, wherever practicable, be provided for each group of the crew on the following scale:

(a) one tub and/or shower bath for every eight persons or less;

(b) one water closet for every eight persons or less;

(c) one wash basin for every six persons or less:

Provided that when the number of persons in a group exceeds an even multiple of the specified number by less than one-half of the specified number, this surplus may be ignored for the purpose of this paragraph.

4. Cold fresh water and hot fresh water or means of heating water shall be available in all communal wash places. The competent authority, in consultation with the fishing vessel owners' and fishermen's organisations, where such exist, may fix the minimum amount of fresh water which the fishing vessel owner may be required to supply per man per day.

5. Wash basins and tub baths shall be of adequate size and constructed of approved material with a smooth surface not liable to crack, flake or corrode.

6. All water closet compartments shall have ventilation to the open air, independently of any other part of the accommodation.

7. All water closets shall be of an approved pattern and provided with an ample flush of water, available at all times and independently controllable.

8. Soil pipes and waste pipes shall be of adequate dimensions and shall be so constructed as to minimise the risk of obstruction and to facilitate cleaning. They shall not pass through fresh water or drinking water tanks; neither should they, if practicable, pass overhead in mess rooms or sleeping accommodation.

9. Sanitary accommodation intended for the use of more than one person shall comply with the following requirements:

(a) floors shall be of approved durable material, easily cleaned and impervious to damp, and should be properly drained;

(b) bulkheads shall be of steel or other approved material and shall be watertight up to at least 9 inches (23 centimetres) above the level of the deck;

(c) the accommodation shall be sufficiently lighted, heated and ventilated;

(d) water closets shall be situated convenient to, but separate from, sleeping rooms and washrooms, without direct access from the sleeping rooms or from a passage between sleeping rooms and water closets to which there is no other access; Provided that this requirement shall not apply where a water closet is located in a compartment between two sleeping rooms having a total of not more than four persons;

(e) where there is more than one water closet in a compartment, they shall be sufficiently screened to ensure privacy.

10. Facilities for washing and drying clothes shall be provided on a scale appropriate to the size of the crew and the normal duration of the voyage.

11. The facilities for washing clothes shall include suitable sinks, which may be installed in wash rooms, if separate laundry accommodation is not reasonably practicable, with an adequate supply of cold fresh water and hot fresh water or means of heating water.

12. The facilities for drying clothes shall be provided in a compartment separate from sleeping rooms, mess rooms and water closets, adequately ventilated and heated and equipped with lines or other fittings for hanging clothes.

Article 13

1. Wherever possible, an isolated cabin shall be provided for a diseased or injured member of the crew. On ships of 500 tons or more there shall be a sick bay.

2. An approved medicine chest with readily understandable instructions shall be carried in every vessel which does not carry a doctor. In this connection the competent authority shall give consideration to the Ships' Medicine Chests Recommendation, 1958, and the Medical Advice at Sea Recommendation, 1958.

Article 14

Sufficient and adequately ventilated accommodation for the hanging of oilskins shall be provided outside but convenient to the sleeping rooms.

Article 15

Crew accommodation shall be maintained in a clean and decently habitable condition and shall be kept free of goods and stores not the personal property of the occupants.

Article 16

1. Satisfactory cooking equipment shall be provided on board and shall, wherever practicable, be fitted in a separate galley.

2. The galley shall be of adequate dimensions for the purpose and shall be well lighted and ventilated.

3. The galley shall be equipped with cooking utensils, the necessary number of cupboards and shelves, sinks and dish racks of rust-proof material and satisfactory drainage. Drinking water shall be supplied to the galley by means of pipes. Where hot water is not supplied to the galley, an apparatus for heating water shall be provided.

4. Galleys shall be provided with suitable facilities for the preparation of hot drinks for the crew at all times.

5. A provision store room of adequate capacity shall be provided which shall be capable of being kept dry, cool and well ventilated in order to avoid deterioration of the stores. Where necessary refrigerators or other low-temperature storage space shall be provided.

6. Where butane or propane gas is used for cooking purposes in galleys the gas containers shall be kept on the open deck.

PART IV. APPLICATION TO EXISTING SHIPS

Article 17

1. Subject to the provisions of paragraphs 2, 3 and 4 of this Article, this Convention applies to vessels the keels of which are laid down subsequent to the coming into force of the Convention for the territory of registration.

2. In the case of a vessel which is fully complete on the date of the coming into force of this Convention for the territory of registration and which is below the standard set by Part III of this Convention, the competent authority may, after consultation with the fishing vessel owners' and fishermen's organisations, where such exist, require such alterations for the purpose of bringing the vessel into conformity with the requirements of the Convention as it deems possible having regard to the practical problems involved, to be made when—

(a) the vessel is re-registered;

(b) substantial structural alterations or major repairs are made to the vessel as a result of long-range plans and not as a result of an accident or an emergency.

3. In the case of a vessel in the process of building and/or reconversion on the date of the coming into force of this Convention for the territory of registration, the competent authority may, after consultation with the fishing vessel owners' and fishermen's organisations, where such exist, require such alterations for the purpose of bringing the ship into conformity with the requirements of the Convention as it deems possible having regard to the practical problems involved; such alterations shall constitute final compliance with the terms of this instrument, unless and until the vessel be re-registered.

4. In the case of a vessel, other than such a vessel as is referred to in paragraphs 2 and 3 of this Article or a vessel to which the provisions of this Convention were applicable while she was under construction, being re-registered in a territory after the date of the coming into force of this Convention for that territory, the competent authority may after consultation with the fishing vessel owners' and fishermen's organisations, where such exist, require such alteration for the purpose of bringing the vessel into conformity with the requirements of the Convention as it deems possible having regard to the practical problems involved; such alterations shall constitute final compliance with the terms of this Convention, unless and until the vessel is again re-registered.

Article 18

Nothing in this Convention shall affect any law, award, custom or agreement between fishing vessel owners and fishermen which ensures more favourable conditions than those provided for by this Convention.

First Report of the Working Party on Vocational Training and Certificates of Competency

Composition and Officers

1. The Working Party on Vocational Training and Certificates of Competency was composed as follows:

Government members:

Titular members:

France: Mr. Doguet.
Federal Republic of Germany: Mr. Dahnen.
Philippines: Mr. Bengzon.
United Kingdom: Mr. Corley.

Deputy members:

Belgium: Mr. Vandensteen.
Canada: Mr. Simard.
Japan: Mr. Okada.
Netherlands: Mr. Ouwehand.

Employers' members:

Titular members:

Mr. Boza Barrios (Peru).
Alternate: Mr. Fernández Stoll (Peru).
Mr. Cobley (United Kingdom).
Mr. Kranenburg (Netherlands).
Mr. Ruthford (United States).

Deputy members:

Mr. Fernández Sánchez (Spain).
Mr. Genschow (Federal Republic of Germany).
Mr. Vindenes (Norway).

Workers' members:

Titular members:

Mr. Dekeyzer (Belgium).
Mr. Gruenais (France).
Mr. Head (United Kingdom).
Mr. Wiemers (Federal Republic of Germany).

Deputy members:

Mr. Harm (Canada).
Mr. Nes (Norway).
Captain Sekine (Japan).

2. The Working Party was chaired by Mr. Rice (Government member, United States) with Mr. Cobley (Employers' member, United Kingdom) as Employers' Vice-Chairman and Mr. Wiemers (Workers' member, Federal Republic of Germany) as Workers' Vice-Chairman. The Reporter was Mr. Corley (Government member, United Kingdom).

3. The Working Party decided to consider, in the light of the comments and suggestions that had been made in the course of the general discussion on the vocational training of fishermen in the Conference, the proposed conclusions on the training of fishermen drafted by the I.L.O.

Examination of Proposed Conclusions on the Training of Fishermen

Paragraph 1

4. The Working Party agreed that there should be an international instrument concerning the training of fishermen.

Paragraph 2

5. The Workers' members proposed that the instrument should take the form of a Convention in view of the importance of vocational training to fishermen at the present time. The Employers' members were firmly opposed to the adoption of a mandatory instrument on vocational training in the form in which it had been proposed by the Office; the instrument should be a Recommendation which should set targets towards which the various countries should aim. The Working Party decided that the instrument should take the form of a Recommendation after the Workers' members, in the interest of obtaining a comprehensive and detailed instrument on vocational training, had agreed to accept a Recommendation.

Paragraph 3

6. A Government member expressed hesitation at the idea expressed in Paragraph 3 that the vocational training of fishermen should be of a standard equivalent to that provided for other trades, occupations and industries in the country. The Working Party felt, however, that it was necessary to retain this provision to emphasise the need for bringing up the standard of training in the fishing industry to the general standard of training prevailing in the various countries.

Paragraph 4

Clause (a).

7. The Working Party accepted a proposal to amplify clause (a) so as to refer to improving the efficiency of the fishing industry as a basic objective of training.

Clause (b).

8. The Working Party adopted clause (b) as drafted.

Clause (c).

9. The Working Party adopted clause (c) as drafted.

Clause (d).

10. The Workers' members supported this provision but felt that it should be further amplified and strengthened to emphasise that trained personnel should be given priority over untrained personnel in employment placing. The Employers' members stated that they could not guarantee employment to fishermen simply because they had undergone a course of training. People with many years' experience in fishing who had not undergone formal training had an equal claim to consideration for obtaining employment. The Employers' members were, however, prepared to facilitate and assist trainees in obtaining employment in the fishing industry. The Working Party adopted clause (d) as drafted.

New Clause (e).

11. To meet the view expressed by various delegates in plenary sittings the Working Party decided to add a new provision as follows: " to assist trainees in reaching their highest productive and earning capacity ".

Paragraph 5

12. To meet the views expressed by delegates in plenary sitting as well as in the Working Party, a modification was made to exclude from the coverage of the proposed instrument research and fishery protection vessels as well as individuals fishing for sport or recreation.

Paragraph 6

13. The Working Party was in agreement with the definitions of skipper, mate and engineer as proposed in the Office text. The Employers' members and a number of Government members expressed misgivings regarding the definition of able fishermen. After long discussion the Working Party decided to defer consideration of Paragraph 6 until the discussion on the question of certificates of competency. The Working Party noted the request made in plenary sitting for amplification of the term " navigation " but considered that in the circumstances the text should remain as drafted on this point.

Paragraph 7

14. Paragraph 7 was adopted as drafted.

Paragraph 8

15. Paragraph 8 was adopted as drafted.

Paragraph 9

16. The Working Party considered a proposal made in plenary sitting to the effect that provision should be made for collaboration not only with neighbouring countries but also with other countries of the region. The Working Party felt that there might be cases where countries outside the region concerned would be involved in collaboration concerning the development of common fishermen's training schemes and decided to replace the word " neighbouring " by " other " countries.

Paragraph 10

17. The Working Party considered several amendments, including two made by delegates in plenary sitting. A proposal to insert the words " whenever possible " in the first sentence was not accepted as it was felt that it would be undesirable to weaken the text on this point. Another proposal to make reference to bodies and individuals having an intimate knowledge of vocational training of fishermen in the second sentence was adopted. The Working Party also accepted a proposal to refer to the role which should be played by specialised fishery research or development institutions in developing countries in connection with the establishment of a national vocational training programme for fishermen. A proposal to insert the words " whenever possible " in the final sentence was accepted.

Paragraph 11

18. Paragraph 11 was adopted as drafted.

Paragraph 12

Clause (a).

19. A proposal made in plenary sitting for fishery research institutions to make information available to other bodies in addition to training centres was incorporated in the text.

Clause (b).

20. Clause (b) was adopted as drafted.

Clause (c).

21. A Government member expressed hesitation about this provision, which he felt might give rise to difficulties in his country, where the Constitution did not allow preference to be given to any particular persons in employment placement. He accepted, however, that the wording was not such as to contain any obligation to give preference to trained fishermen in employment placement, and the Working Party then adopted clause (c) as drafted.

Clause (d).

22. Clause (d) was adopted as drafted.

Clause (e).

23. Clause (e) was adopted as drafted.

Subparagraph (1).

24. The Working Party considered a proposal made in plenary sitting for a reference to be included to the potential contribution—particularly in developing countries—which the fishing industry might make to economic development if proper training schemes were introduced. The Working Party felt that this idea was expressed elsewhere in the conclusions, n particular in Paragraph 4, and therefore did not accept the proposal but adopted the text as proposed.

Subparagraph (2).

25. Subparagraph (2) was adopted as drafted.

Subparagraph (3).

26. The Working Party considered a proposal made in plenary sitting to the effect that training in publicly operated training centres could not always be given entirely without charge to the trainee. The Workers' members expressed strong opposition to this proposal and the Working Party accepted the text as drafted.

Paragraph 14

Subparagraph (1).

27. The Working Party adopted subparagraph (1) with the addition of the word " seamanship " in clause (d).

Subparagraph (2).

28. The Working Party adopted subparagraph (2) as drafted.

Paragraph 15

29. The Working Party adopted a proposal to make it clear that the subjects to be included in the curricula of the various training programmes for fishermen should include only such as were appropriate for the functions to be exercised by the trainee.

Clause (a).

30. A proposal to make reference to repair of electronic equipment in clause (a) was not accepted, the view of the Working Party being that fishermen should not be required to repair such equipment which demanded very highly specialised servicing. The Working Party adopted the text as proposed.

Clause (b).

31. The Working Party adopted clause (b) as drafted.

Clauses (c) and (d).

32. The Working Party considered a proposal made in plenary sitting to the effect that specific reference should be made in clause (c) to methods of processing fishing products on board fishing vessels wherever fishermen may be engaged in such activities. The Working Party felt that this proposal was fully covered under the present wording.

33. The Working Party, however, divided the clause into two clauses, namely (c) and (d), the remaining clauses being relettered accordingly.

Clause (e) (Formerly Clause (d)).

34. A proposal made in plenary sitting to delete reference to merchant vessels in clause (e) was accepted and the words " or other equipment " were inserted after the word " engines ".

Clause (f) (Formerly Clause (e)).

35. The Working Party adopted clause (f) as drafted.

Clause (g) (Formerly Clause (f)).

36. A proposal to insert a reference to fire fighting was included in clause (g).

Clause (h) (Formerly Clause (g)).

37. The Working Party adopted clause (h) as drafted.

Clause (i) (Formerly Clause (h)).

38. The Working Party adopted clause (i) as drafted.

Clause (j) (Formerly Clause (i)).

39. The Working Party adopted clause (j) as drafted.

Clause (k) (Formerly Clause (j)).

40. The Working Party adopted clause (k) as drafted.

Clause (l) (Formerly Clause (k)).

41. The Working Party adopted clause (l) as drafted.

42. The Working Party adopted clause (m) as drafted.

Paragraph 16

43. The Working Party considered certain proposals relating in particular to the question of able fishermen but decided to defer consideration of Paragraph 16 to the discussion concerning fishermen's certificates of competency.

Paragraph 17

Subparagraph (1).

44. The Working Party adopted subparagraph (1) as drafted.

Subparagraph (2).

45. Various members expressed strong hesitation about the need for giving college-level training to fishermen, while others emphasised that this was the practice in their countries. The Working Party agreed to qualify subparagraph (2) by adding at the beginning the words " Where appropriate to the vessels in use " so as to make it clear that the skippers of smaller fishing boats did not require college-level training.

Paragraph 18

Clause (a).

46. The Working Party adopted clause (a) as drafted.

Clause (b).

47. The Working Party adopted clause (b) as drafted.

Clause (c).

48. The Working Party adopted clause (c) as drafted.

Clause (d).

49. The proposal was made to delete clause (d) on the grounds that it enabled countries to reduce the period of training of fishermen in cases of strong demand for manpower for the fishing industry to a level which was inconsistent with the standards required. Some members emphasised the importance of the provision, and the Working Party agreed to retain it with the addition of the words " subject to the maintenance of adequate standards of training ".

Paragraph 19

Subparagraph (1).

50. The Working Party adopted subparagraph (1) as drafted.

Subparagraph (2).

51. The Working Party adopted subparagraph (2) as drafted.

Subparagraph (3).

52. The Working Party adopted subparagraph (3) as drafted.

New Subparagraph (4).

53. The Working Party decided to add a new subparagraph (4) in order to emphasise the need for teaching staff to possess an aptitude for teaching and to receive training in teaching techniques.

Paragraph 20

54. The Working Party decided to qualify this provision by adding the words " in so far as this is appropriate to the general conditions in the particular country ".

Paragraph 21

55. The Working Party adopted paragraph 21 as drafted.

Paragraph 22

Subparagraph (1).

56. The Working Party adopted subparagraph (1) as drafted with the addition of the following words in clause (b): " and in making the latter where appropriate ".

Subparagraph (2).

57. The Working Party adopted subparagraph (2) as drafted.

Paragraph 23

58. The Working Party adopted Paragraph 23 as drafted, with a slight amendment to indicate that the training programmes enumerated in the paragraph could be given separately.

Paragraph 24

59. Various suggestions for additions to or redrafting of the text were considered. The Workers' members emphasised the desirability of employers' releasing their fishermen for training periods ashore. During short-term training courses fishermen, including share fishermen, should receive payments which enabled them to maintain themselves and their families at a level similar to that which they enjoyed when working. The Employers' members stated that they could not agree to the present wording, under which they were obliged to release fishermen who asked for time off to attend a training course. They also felt that they could not pay fishermen full wages for the periods of attendance of short-term training courses. There was also the difficulty of determining the appropriate wage, particularly for share fishermen. A number of Government members referred to the various payments and subsistence allowances which were available in their countries to trainees during their training. The Working Party finally agreed that Paragraph 24 should be redrafted as follows:

(1) All appropriate measures should be taken to enable working fishermen to attend short courses ashore.

(2) Working fishermen should receive adequate financial compensation for the periods in which they attend short-term training courses.

There was general agreement that the provisions of this paragraph applied to working fishermen only and not to entrants to the industry.

Paragraph 25

60. The Working Party considered a proposal to qualify this provision to take into account the position in the developing countries and agreed to substitute the word " should " in the third line by the word " may ".

Clause (a).

61. The Working Party adopted clause (a) as drafted.

Clause (b).

62. The Working Party adopted clause (b) as drafted.

New Clause (c).

63. The Working Party agreed to add a new clause which would refer to " periodic visits of research workers and extension officers to fishing areas ".

Paragraph 26

64. A proposal to incorporate in Paragraph 26 a reference to the need that before attending a training course trainees should have sea experience was not accepted as it was contrary to the practice followed in a number of countries, and the Working Party adopted the provision as drafted.

Paragraph 27

Subparagraph (1).

65. The Working Party adopted subparagraph (1) as drafted.

Subparagraph (2).

66. The Working Party adopted subparagraph (2) as drafted, with the addition of the word " seamanship ".

Subparagraph (3).

67. The Working Party adopted subparagraph (3) as drafted.

Subparagraph (4).

68. The Working Party adopted subparagraph (4) as drafted.

Paragraph 28

69. The Working Party adopted Paragraph 28 as drafted.

Paragraph 29

70. The Working Party adopted Paragraph 29 as drafted.

Paragraph 30

Subparagraph (1).

71. On the basis of a proposal made in plenary sitting the Working Party decided to add a specific reference to developing countries in subparagraph (1).

Subparagraph (2).

72. The Working Party adopted subparagraph (2) as drafted.

ADOPTION OF REPORT AND PROPOSED CONCLUSIONS

73. The Working Party unanimously adopted its first report and certain conclusions concerning the training of fishermen. The Working Party will present a second report relating to the other points for discussion referred to it by the Conference.

Geneva, 25 October 1965.

(Signed) T. D. RICE,
Chairman.
P. M. S. CORLEY,
Reporter.

Second Report of the Working Party on Vocational Training and Certificates of Competency

COMPOSITION

1. The following changes were made in the composition of the Working Party for the discussion of the item on certificates of competency:

Government members :

Titular members :

France: Mr. WARASSE.

Alternate: Mr. DOGUET.

Federal Republic of Germany: Mr. FETTBACK.

2. The Working Party considered the proposed conclusions concerning fishermen's certificates of competency as drafted by the I.L.O. and the various suggestions put forward in plenary sitting on this question. The Working Party also discussed the two points in the conclusions concerning the training of fishermen which had been postponed for consideration under the item on certificates of competency.

3. The report comments only on those points on which the Working Party as a whole or members of it desired to clarify their position.

EXAMINATION OF OUTSTANDING QUESTIONS PERTAINING TO THE PROPOSED CONCLUSIONS CONCERNING THE TRAINING OF FISHERMEN

4. The Working Party held a long discussion on the desirability of including in the text on certificates of competency provisions covering able fishermen. The Workers' members strongly emphasised the advantages of a certification system for this occupation: it would help to maintain standards of fishing skills, improve the efficiency of fishermen, foster the development and improvement of fishermen's vocational training programmes by setting goals for training schemes, and promote safety at sea. They pointed out that a number of countries already issued certificates and diplomas to various categories of skilled fishermen.

5. The Employers' members were opposed to a mandatory provision which would require countries to introduce a certificate of competency for able fishermen similar to those issued to deck and engineer officers in view of the diverse nature of the fishing industry, of fishing operations and fishing vessels which demand different skills of the crews of fishing boats.

6. The Government members expressed strong hesitation at introducing a certificate of competency for able fishermen to be issued under governmental authority, on the grounds that the justification for such a certificate rested on matters concerning status and pay rather than on safety. They referred to the diplomas and certificates issued by various bodies, including in particular training institutions, and emphasised that recognition of the skill possessed by a fisherman was given also in other ways, as, for example, in collective agreements. The Working Party agreed that the certification of able fishermen should be dealt with in the conclusions concerning the training of fishermen.

Paragraph 6

7. The Working Party, having accepted the definitions of skipper, mate and engineer as proposed in the draft conclusions, examined a text which would cover the term " fisherman ". The Working Party agreed to refer in the provision to " skilled " instead of " able " fisherman and to accept the following definition: " any experienced member of the deck crew working on board a fishing vessel, participating in the operation of the vessel, preparing gear for fishing, catching fish, loading catch and processing it, and maintaining and repairing nets or other fishing equipment ".

Paragraph 16

8. The Working Party accepted a text for Paragraph 16 based on a draft produced by the Reporter in the light of the ideas expressed in the draft regarding the certification of able fishermen.

EXAMINATION OF PROPOSED CONCLUSIONS CONCERNING FISHERMEN'S CERTIFICATES OF COMPETENCY

Articles 1 and 2

9. The Working Party agreed that there should be an international instrument concerning fishermen's certificates of competency and that this should take the form of a Convention. The United States Government and Employers' members stated that they could not accept a Convention but were in favour of a Recommendation.

Article 3

10. The Working Party adopted Article 3 as drafted.

Article 4

11. The Working Party agreed to exclude from Article 4 " ships and boats engaged in fishing for sport or recreation " and " fishery research and protection vessels ". The United States Government member submitted a proposal to increase the minimum tonnage from 25 to 75 gross registered tons. This was carefully considered but the Working Party decided, in the light of the position in law and in practice in the majority of countries, to retain the tonnage as drafted. The United States Government and Employers' members emphasised that they could not accept this tonnage, as regulations in the United States required the carrying of certificated officers only on board vessels of over 200 gross registered tons. Reservations were also expressed by the Government and Employers' members of Canada, who were prepared to accept 100 gross tons, and the Netherlands Government member, who could accept 50 gross tons.

Article 5

12. The Working Party adopted Article 5 as drafted with the deletion of the reference to " able fishermen ", it being understood that member States were not obliged to use the terms set out in this Article and that a member State could use different titles to distinguish different grades of certificates.

Article 6

13. The Working Party adopted Article 6 as drafted.

Article 7

Paragraph 1, Clause (a).

14. The Working Party adopted clause (a) as drafted, it being understood that the term " skipper " should be taken to mean any person having command or charge of a fishing vessel.

Clause (b).

15. The Working Party accepted a proposal to insert a reference to " areas " in clause (b) in order to clarify the powers of the competent authorities as regards the application of this provision to coastal fishing. Other proposals to raise the tonnage requirement to 150 and 200 gross tons were not accepted as it was felt that the provision as drafted provided sufficient flexibility to exclude vessels over 100 gross registered tons, engaged in inshore and coastal fishing, which in many countries were not required to carry both a skipper and a certificated mate. The Government member of Japan and the Employers' members of Spain and the United States entered general reservations as regards the application of this provision in their countries.

Clause (c).

16. The Working Party considered a proposal to delete a reference to a specific horsepower requirement in clause (c) and agreed that the requirement concerning engine power should be determined by the competent authority in each country after consultation with fishing vessel owners' and fishermen's organisations. The Working Party also agreed to make provision for the mate to act as engineer in appropriate cases and on condition that he also holds an engineer's certificate.

Paragraph 2.

17. The Working Party decided to add a reference to " area " to paragraph 2 and to specify that the various grades of certificates for skippers, mates or engineers should be determined by national laws and regulations.

New Paragraph 3.

18. The Working Party also accepted a new provision which would enable the competent authorities in individual cases to permit a fishing vessel to put to sea without the full complement of certificated personnel in certain clearly defined cases.

Article 8

19. The Working Party accepted a proposal to reduce the minimum age for obtaining a certificate of skipper from 21 to 20 years and to reduce from 19 to 18 years the age requirement for obtaining a certificate as skipper in a fishing vessel engaged in coastal fishing and as engineer in a fishing vessel of less than 500 h.p. The French Government member entered a reservation in respect of the proviso of Article 8 which he considered did not provide sufficient flexibility for application to conditions in France.

Article 9

Paragraph 1.

20. The Working Party adopted paragraph 1 as drafted, with the deletion of the word " able " before " fisherman ".

Paragraph 2.

21. The Working Party considered a proposal to render paragraph 2 more flexible and adopted wording to that effect.

Article 10

22. A proposal to make Article 10 more flexible was accepted by the Working Party, and reference to able fishermen was deleted. The French Government member entered a reservation in respect of this provision, which could not be applied to conditions in his country.

Article 11

23. The Working Party accepted a proposal to reduce the qualifying period of sea service required for obtaining an engineer's certificate by a certificated skipper or mate.

Article 12

24. The Working Party adopted Article 12 as drafted. The Government member of Japan entered a general reservation in respect of the period of 12 months.

Article 13

25. The Working Party considered a proposal to make a distinction between the nautical and purely fishing subjects which should be covered by certification examinations for skippers and mates and agreed that the inclusion of fishing subjects should not be made mandatory. The fishing subjects are set out in Article 14 of the proposed conclusions. The Working Party also agreed to certain minor modifications.

New Article 14

26. The Working Party agreed to insert a new Article 14 concerning fishing subjects as a result of the decision to divide the list of subjects to be covered by deck officers' examination requirements, as noted in paragraph 25 of this report.

Article 15 (Formerly Article 14)

27. The Working Party adopted Article 15 as drafted.

Article 16 (Formerly Article 15)

28. The Working Party accepted a proposal to delete clause (c) as drafted, which provided that Members should make arrangements for mutual assistance in the enforcement of national laws or regulations giving effect to the provisions of the instrument on the grounds that this might lead to confusion and difficulties between contracting governments.

Article 17 (Formerly Article 16)

29. The Working Party accepted a proposal to delete clause (b) of paragraph (2) which provided that penalties or disciplinary measures should be prescribed for cases in which a skipper had allowed duties requiring certification to be performed by a person not holding the appropriate or a superior certificate on the grounds that this provision was too onerous for skippers having regard to the nature of conditions of work at sea. The former clause (c) now becomes clause (b).

30. The Canadian Employers' member stated that in the light of developments in his country he was obliged at this time to enter a general reservation regarding the application of the proposed conclusions concerning fishermen's certificates of competency in Canada.

ADOPTION OF THE REPORT AND OF THE PROPOSED CONCLUSIONS

31. The Working Party unanimously adopted its second report, Paragraphs 6 and 16 of the proposed conclusions concerning the training of fishermen and the text of the proposed conclusions concerning fishermen's certificates of competency. The text of these two sets of conclusions is reproduced below.

28 October 1965.

(Signed) T. D. RICE,
Chairman.

P. M. S. CORLEY,
Reporter.

Examination by the Conference of the First Report of the Working Party on Vocational Training and Certificates of Competency and of the Proposed Conclusions Annexed Thereto

At its ninth plenary sitting the Conference had before it the first report of the Working Party on Vocational Training and Certificates of Competency, together with the proposed conclusions concerning the training of fishermen (with the exception of Paragraphs 6 and 16).

Mr. CORLEY (Government delegate, United Kingdom; Reporter of the Working Party on Vocational Training and Certificates of Competency), in presenting the report and the proposed conclusions concerning the training of fishermen, drew attention to the fact that the Working Party had deferred consideration of Paragraphs 6 and 16 of the proposed conclusions. These Paragraphs contained references to able fishermen which the Working Party felt should be considered in the context of the proposed conclusions concerning fishermen's certificates of competency. The Working Party would be submitting a second report on this matter.

The Working Party had been particularly anxious to produce a text which would act as a guide to both industrialised and developing countries. He felt that the Working Party had succeeded in this objective and, in this connection, he expressed his gratitude to Mr. Rice, the Chairman.

Mr. RICE (Government adviser, United States; Chairman of the Working Party on Vocational Training and Certificates of Competency) thanked the Working Party for its co-operation, which had enabled it to complete its work satisfactorily.

Mr. WIEMERS (Workers' delegate, Federal Republic of Germany; Vice-Chairman of the Working Party on Vocational Training and Certificates of Competency) stated that the Workers' group had nothing to add to the first report. Although their wishes had not been entirely met they were in general agreement with the proposed conclusions and felt that the instrument would benefit not only fishermen and the fishing industry but also the world's economy and the nutrition of mankind.

The Workers' group considered that Part III of the proposed conclusions concerning fishermen's certificates of competency would have to be added to the proposed conclusions on the vocational training of fishermen.

He paid tribute, on behalf of the Workers' group, to Mr. Rice, as Chairman of the Working Party, and to Mr. Corley for his contribution to their discussions as a member of the Government group and for his excellent and succinct report.

Mr. COBLEY (Employers' delegate, United Kingdom; Vice-Chairman of the Working Party on Vocational Training and Certificates of Competency) expressed the general satisfaction of the Employers' group with the first report. He associated the Employers' group with the thanks expressed by Mr. Wiemers on behalf of the Workers' group to Mr. Rice and Mr. Corley for their invaluable assistance in the deliberations of the Working Party.

Mr. FERNÁNDEZ STOLL (Employers' adviser, Peru) explained that the Peruvian Employers' delegation had certain reservations concerning the last sentence of Paragraph 13 (1) of the proposed conclusions. The financing of the training of fishermen should be commensurate with the needs of the fishing industry and not, as suggested in Paragraph 13 (1), commensurate with the contribution of the fishing industry to the national economy. In Peru the fishing industry earned nearly a third of Peru's annual foreign exchange and, if the wording of the text were to be applied in Peru, training schemes would have to include universities and schools for all children over the age of five. The Peruvian Employers' delegation was not putting forward specific proposals at this time, but was making a reservation which it would repeat at the forthcoming session of the International Labour Conference.

Mr. OKADA (Government delegate, Japan) stated that the Japanese Government was unable to accept the first sentence of Paragraph 13 (3).

The first report of the Working Party on Vocational Training and Certificates of Competency was adopted.

The proposed conclusions on the training of fishermen were adopted on the understanding that Paragraphs 6 and 16 would be considered in connection with the second report of the Working Party.

Examination by the Conference of the Second Report of the Working Party on Vocational Training and Certificates of Competency and of the Proposed Conclusions Annexed Thereto

At its eleventh plenary sitting the Conference had before it the second report of the Working Party on Vocational Training and Certificates of Competency, together with the proposed text of Paragraphs 6 and 16 of the conclusions on the training of fishermen and the proposed conclusions concerning fishermen's certificates of competency.

In submitting the report and the proposed conclusions Mr. CORLEY (Government delegate, United Kingdom; Reporter of the Working Party on Vocational Training and Certificates of Competency) drew attention to the fact that the Working Party had agreed, for reasons given in the second report, that the certification of able fishermen should be dealt with in the proposed conclusions on the training of fishermen. He also pointed out that the Working Party had accepted changes in the text of Paragraphs 6 and 16 of the proposed conclusions on the training of fishermen. The Working Party had endeavoured to reach agreement on instruments which would lay down precise international standards and at the same time leave room for flexibility of application in the different countries. Reservations which had been made in respect of certain provisions in these instruments had been reported in the second report.

Mr. RAPPAI (Government delegate, U.S.S.R.; Vice-President of the Conference) regretted that the proposed conclusions concerning fishermen's certificates of competency annexed to the second report excluded fishery research and protection vessels. In the U.S.S.R. many fishermen were employed on such vessels and were covered by the regulations in force. He recalled his earlier proposal to make the instrument flexible enough for the different governments to be able to take into account national practice and conditions. As this proposal did not seem to have been reflected in the proposed conclusions annexed to the second report, he reserved the right to raise this point again at the forthcoming session of the International Labour Conference.

The second report of the Working Party on Vocational Training and Certificates of Competency was adopted.

Paragraphs 6 and 16 of the proposed conclusions on the training of fishermen were adopted.

The proposed conclusions concerning fishermen's certificates of competency were adopted.

The texts of the conclusions concerning the training of fishermen and of the conclusions concerning fishermen's certificates of competency are reproduced below.

Conclusions concerning the Training of Fishermen

1. There should be an international instrument concerning the training of fishermen.

2. The instrument should take the form of a Recommendation.

3. In the preamble, the instrument should refer to the Vocational Training Recommendation, 1962, which, with three exceptions, applies to all training and should state that, in application of that instrument, the vocational training of fishermen should be of a standard equivalent to that provided for other trades, occupations and industries in the country.

4. The preamble should also state the basic objectives of the training of fishermen, as follows:

(a) to improve the efficiency of the fishing industry and to secure general recognition of the economic and social significance of fishing to the national economy;

(b) to encourage the entry into the fishing industry of a sufficient number of suitable persons;

(c) to provide training and retraining facilities commensurate with the current and projected manpower needs of the fishing industry for all the various fishing occupations;

(d) to assist and facilitate the entry into employment of all trainees after completion of their courses; and

(e) to assist trainees in reaching their highest productive and earning capacity.

5. (1) The instrument should apply to all training of fishermen for work on board fishing vessels.

(2) " Fishing vessels " should be defined as all ships and boats, of any nature whatsoever, whether publicly or privately owned, which are engaged in maritime fishing in salt waters, with the exception of ships and boats engaged in whaling and similar pursuits and research and fishery protection vessels.

(3) The instrument should not apply to individuals fishing for sport or recreation.

6. For the purpose of the instrument, the following terms should be defined as having the meanings hereby assigned to them:

(a) skipper: any person having command or charge of a fishing vessel;

(b) mate: any person exercising subordinate command of a fishing vessel, including any person other than a pilot liable at any time to be in charge of the navigation of the vessel;

(c) engineer: any person permanently responsible for the mechanical propulsion of a fishing vessel;

(d) skilled fisherman: any experienced member of the deck crew working on board a fishing vessel, participating in the operation of the vessel, preparing gear for fishing, catching fish, loading catch and processing it, and maintaining and repairing nets or other fishing equipment.

7. The instrument should further contain the following provisions:

I. National Planning and Administration

Planning and Co-ordination

8. In planning a national education and training policy, the competent authorities in the countries possessing or intending to develop a fishing industry should ensure that adequate provision is made in the general network of training facilities for the training of fishermen.

9. Where national circumstances do not permit the development of facilities for the training at all levels of skill required, collaboration with other countries in the development of common fishery training schemes for such skills and occupations as cannot be covered by national programmes should be considered.

10. (1) The activities of all public and private institutions in each country engaged in the training of fishermen should be co-ordinated and developed on the basis of a national programme.

(2) Such a programme should be drawn up by the competent authorities in co-operation with organisations of fishing employers and fishermen, with educational and fishery research institutions, and with other bodies or individuals having an intimate knowledge of the vocational training of fishermen. In developing countries in which specialised fishery research or development institutes are established in co-operation with other countries or international organisations, such institutes should play a leading part in the establishment of the national programme.

(3) To facilitate the planning, development, co-ordination and administration of fishermen's training schemes, joint advisory policy and administrative bodies should whenever possible be set up at the national level and, where appropriate, also at the regional and local levels.

11. The competent authorities should ensure that the various agencies and institutions responsible for the dissemination of information on training and employment opportunities, such as primary and secondary schools, vocational guidance and employment counselling services, public employment services, vocational and technical training institutions and organisations of fishing employers and fishermen, are supplied with complete information on public and private training schemes for fishermen and on conditions of entry into fishing.

12. The competent authorities should ensure that fishermen's vocational training schemes are fully co-ordinated with any other programmes and activities, public or private, related to the fishing industry. In particular, they should make certain that—

(a) fishery research institutions make information on their latest discoveries of practical interest to fishing readily available to training centres and other interested bodies, and through these to working fishermen. Where possible, the research institutions should contribute to the advanced training of fishermen, and fishermen's training centres should, as appropriate, assist these institutions in their work;

(b) measures are taken through the provision of general education prior to or simultaneously with vocational training to advance the general level of education in fishing communities, to promote greater satisfaction among fishermen and to facilitate the assimilation of technical and vocational training;

(c) arrangements are made, with the co-operation of organisations of fishing employers and fishermen, in order that, other things being equal, preference may be given in employment placement to persons who have completed a public or private training course;

(d) arrangements are made, with the co-operation of organisations of fishing employers and fishermen, particularly in developing countries, for trainees completing public and private courses either to enter employment on fishing vessels or, alternatively, to acquire and operate suitably equipped fishing vessels, individually, by forming co-operatives for the joint purchase and use of fishing boats, or by any other appropriate means;

(e) the output of trained fishermen is adjusted to the number of boats and the equipment available or planned to be available in the country.

Financing

13. (1) Fishermen's training schemes should be systematically organised, and financing should be on an adequate and regular basis commensurate with the contribution which the fishing industry makes to the national economy.

(2) Where required, the government should make financial contributions to training schemes carried on by local government or private bodies. These contributions may take the form of general subsidies, grants of land and buildings or of demonstration material such as boats, engines, navigational equipment and fishing gear, provision of instructors free of charge, or payment of fees for trainees.

(3) Training in publicly operated training centres for fishermen should be given without charge to the trainee. In addition, the training of adults and young persons in need should be facilitated by financial and economic assistance of the kind envisaged in Paragraph 7, subparagraphs 3 and 5, of the Vocational Training Recommendation, 1962.

Training Standards

14. (1) The competent authorities, in co-operation with the joint bodies mentioned in Paragraph 10, should define and establish general standards for fishermen's training applicable throughout the territory of the country. These standards should be in conformity with the national requirements for obtaining the various fishermen's certificates of competency and should lay down—

(a) the minimum age of entry into fishermen's training schemes;

(b) the nature of medical examinations, including chest X-rays and hearing and sight tests required for persons entering training schemes. The examinations, particularly the sight and hearing tests, may differ for boys entering deck and those entering engine courses;

(c) the level of general education which is required for admission to fishermen's training schemes;

(d) the fishing, navigation and seamanship, safety, engineering, catering and other subject-matter which should be included in the training curricula;

(e) the amount of practical training, including time spent in engineering shops and at sea, which trainees should undergo;

(f) duration of the training courses for the various fishing occupations and the different levels of competency;

(g) the nature of any examinations following the completion of the training courses; and

(h) the experience and qualifications of the teaching staff of training institutions.

(2) Where national standards cannot be laid down, the recommended standards, which should be as uniform as possible throughout the territory of the country, should be determined by the competent authorities in co-operation with the joint bodies mentioned in Paragraph 10.

II. Training Programmes

General

15. The curricula of the various training programmes for fishermen should be based on a systematic analysis of the work required in fishing and should be established in consultation with the joint advisory bodies mentioned in Paragraph 10. They should be periodically reviewed and kept up to date with technical developments and should, as appropriate for the functions to be exercised, include, inter alia, training in—

(a) fishing techniques, including where appropriate the operation of electronic equipment for the location of fish, and operation, maintenance and repair of fishing gear;

(b) navigation, seamanship and ship handling, appropriate to the sea area and to the type of fishing for which the course is designed;

(c) stowage, cleaning and processing of fish on board;

(d) boat maintenance and other related matters;

(e) engine operation, maintenance and repair of steam or internal combustion (gasoline or diesel) engines or other equipment which the trainee may be called upon to use;

(f) operation and maintenance of radio and radar installations which the trainee may be called upon to use;

(g) safety at sea and safety in handling fishing gear, including such matters as stability, effects of icing, fire fighting, water-tight integrity, personal safety, gear and machinery safeguards, rigging safety measures, engine-room safety and lifeboat handling, use of inflatable life rafts, first aid and medical care and other related matters;

(h) theoretical subjects relevant to fishing, including marine biology and oceanography, which will enable trainees to gain a broad foundation of further instruction and training leading to promotion or to changing to another fishing occupation or to another type of fishing;

(i) general educational subjects, especially in long-term training but also, although to a more limited extent, in short courses;

(j) operation, maintenance and repair of refrigeration systems, fire-fighting equipment, deck and trawling winches and other mechanical equipment of fishing vessels;

(k) principles of shipboard electrical power installations, and maintenance and repair of the electrical machinery and equipment of fishing vessels;

(l) health and physical education, especially swimming, where training facilities permit;

(m) specialised courses in deck, engine and other subjects after an introductory period of general fishing instruction.

16. (1) National standards should, where practicable and appropriate, be established for certificates of competency; diplomas qualifying a person to act as skipper (various grades); mate (various grades); engineer (various grades); boatswain; skilled fisherman (various grades); cook; or other deck or engine-room personnel.

(2) Training programmes should be chiefly designed to prepare trainees for certification and should be directly related to national certification standards; they should take account of the minimum ages and minimum professional experience laid down by the competent authorities in respect of the various grades of certificates of competency.

(3) Where national certification examinations do not exist or do not exist for the particular duty in question, training courses should nevertheless prepare trainees for particular duties such as those listed above. All trainees successfully completing such training courses should receive a diploma concerning the course followed.

17. (1) Programmes should be available to train fishermen to perform duties as skippers and engineers of all types of vessels in use in the fishing fleet of the country concerned, including larger distant-water vessels.

(2) Where appropriate to the vessels in use, college-level fishing and navigation courses should be established which are of the same level as merchant navy officers' training programmes but which provide training in subject-matters appropriate to fishing.

18. The duration of the various training programmes should be sufficient to enable trainees to assimilate the instruction given, and should be determined with reference to such matters as—

(a) the level of training required for the occupation for which the course is designed;

(b) the general educational level and age required of trainees entering the course;

(c) the trainees' previous practical experience; and

(d) the urgency of turning out trained fishermen in the country, subject to the maintenance of adequate standards of training.

19. (1) The teaching staff should include persons possessing a broad general education, a theoretical technical education and satisfactory relevant practical fishing experience.

(2) Where it is not possible to recruit a teaching staff with these qualifications, persons with practical experience in fishing and holding appropriate certificates of competency should be employed.

(3) Where it is not possible to recruit a full-time teaching staff with practical fishing experience, persons with satisfactory relevant practical fishing experience should be employed on a part-time basis.

(4) All teaching staff should have an aptitude for teaching and should be given appropriate teacher training by the competent educational authorities.

Pre-Vocational Training

20. In fishing communities, measures consistent with the Minimum Age (Fishermen) Convention, 1959, should be taken to provide pre-vocational training, including training in elementary practical seamanship, basic commercial fishing techniques and navigational principles, to schoolchildren, in so far as this is appropriate to the general conditions in the particular country.

Short Courses for Working Fishermen

21. Training courses should be available for working fishermen to enable them to increase their technical skills and knowledge, to keep abreast of improved fishing and navigation techniques and to qualify for promotion.

22. (1) Training courses for working fishermen should be specifically designed for the purposes of—

(a) complementing the basic long-term courses by providing advanced specialised training for promotion;

(b) providing training in fishing techniques new to the area, in operating, maintaining and repairing new types of engines or gear, and in making the latter where appropriate;

(c) providing all levels of training for fishermen who were unable to participate in a basic long-term training course;

(d) providing accelerated training in countries in process of development.

(2) The courses should be of short duration and should be considered to be complementary to and not substitutes for basic long-term training programmes.

23. The courses, which may take the form of mobile courses which can be used to bring instructors and demonstration equipment to isolated fishing centres, should in particular consist of programmes involving—

(a) evening courses;

(b) seasonal courses offered during stormy months or slack fishing periods; or

(c) daytime courses for which fishermen temporarily leave their work for short periods.

24. (1) All appropriate measures should be taken to enable working fishermen to attend short courses ashore.

(2) Working fishermen should receive adequate financial compensation for the periods in which they attend short-term training courses.

25. Where long-term courses and short courses for working fishermen do not meet training needs, particularly in isolated areas, these courses may be supplemented by—

(a) special radio and television courses and programmes providing fishing information;

(b) correspondence courses specially adapted to the needs of working fishermen and arranged for use by study groups with occasional lectures or attendance at training schools;

(c) periodic visits of research workers and extension officers to fishing areas.

III. Methods of Training

26. The training methods adopted by fishermen's training schemes should be the most effective possible, considering the nature of the courses, the trainees' experience, general education and age, and the demonstration equipment and financial support available.

27. (1) Practical training, in which the students themselves participate, should be an important part of all fishermen's training programmes.

(2) Fishing training vessels should be used by all training institutions with programmes for boys entering fishing to provide instruction in fishing techniques, navigation and seamanship, engine operation and other matters. These vessels should conduct actual fishing operations.

(3) Training vessels should, whenever possible, be attached to technical schools providing advanced training.

(4) (a) Demonstration equipment such as engines, gear, fishing-boat models, workshop equipment and navigational aids should be used in training programmes.

(b) Such equipment should be prepared in collaboration with fishing research centres and should include, whenever possible, the latest gear and navigational aids.

(c) Such equipment should be selected with reference to the gear, boats and engines which the trainees may be called upon to use.

(d) Films and other audio-visual aids, although they may be useful in some cases, should not be a substitute for demonstration equipment in the use of which trainees themselves take an active part.

(e) Visits should be organised for trainees to fishing vessels equipped with modern or special installations, fishery research centres, or fishing centres away from the area in which the school is located.

28. Practical training may also be provided by periods of fishing at sea on board commercial fishing vessels.

29. Theoretical training, including general education, given as part of a training course should be directly related to the knowledge and skills required by fishermen and should, wherever possible, be integrated with the practical training offered.

IV. International Co-operation

30. (1) Countries should co-operate in promoting fishermen's vocational training, particularly in developing countries.

(2) This co-operation, as appropriate, may include such matters as—

(a) working with the help of international organisations to obtain and train teaching staff to establish and improve fishermen's training facilities;

(b) establishing joint training facilities or joint fishing research centres with other countries, where the need arises;

(c) making training facilities available to selected trainees or instructor trainees from other countries, and sending trainees or instructor trainees to training facilities in other countries;

(d) arranging international exchanges of personnel and international seminars and working parties;

(e) providing instructors for fishermen's training schools in other countries.

Conclusions concerning Fishermen's Certificates of Competency

Article 1

There should be an international instrument concerning fishermen's certificates of competency.

Article 2

The international instrument should take the form of a Convention.

Article 3

The instrument should recall in its preamble the provisions of the Officers' Competency Certificates Convention, 1936, which is applicable to fishing vessels, and which provides that no person shall be engaged to perform or shall perform on board any vessel to which it applies the duties of master or skipper, navigating officer in charge of a watch, chief engineer or engineer officer in charge of a watch, unless he holds a certificate of competency to perform such duties, issued or approved by the public authority where the vessel is registered, and should indicate that experience has shown that further international standards specifying minimum requirements for certificates of competency for service in fishing vessels are desirable.

Part I: Scope and Definitions

Article 4

For the purpose of this instrument, the term " fishing vessel " should be defined as including all ships and boats of any nature whatsoever, whether publicly or privately owned, which are engaged in maritime fishing in salt waters and are registered in a territory for which the instrument is in force, with the exception of—

(a) ships and boats of less than 25 gross registered tons;

(b) ships and boats engaged in whaling and similar pursuits;

(c) ships and boats engaged in fishing for sport or recreation;

(d) fishery research and protection vessels.

Article 5

For the purpose of the instrument, the following terms should be defined as having the meanings hereby assigned to them:

(a) skipper: any person having command or charge of a fishing vessel;

(b) mate: any person exercising subordinate command of a fishing vessel, including any person other than a pilot liable at any time to be in charge of the navigation of a vessel;

(c) engineer: any person permanently responsible for the mechanical propulsion of a fishing vessel.

Part II: Certification

Article 6

The instrument should provide for the establishment of national standards of qualification for certificates of competency entitling a person to perform the duties of skipper, mate and engineer on board a fishing vessel.

Article 7

1. The instrument should provide that—

(a) all fishing vessels to which the instrument applies should be required to carry a certificated skipper;

(b) all fishing vessels over 100 gross registered tons engaged in operations and areas to be defined by national laws or regulations should be required to carry a certificated mate;

(c) all fishing vessels over an engine power to be determined by the competent authority, after consultation with the fishing vessel owners and fishermen's organisations, where such exist, should be required to carry a certificated engineer: Provided that the skipper or mate of a fishing vessel may act as engineer in appropriate cases and on condition that he also holds an engineer's certificate.

2. The certificates of skippers, mates or engineers may be full or limited, according to the size, type and nature and area of operations of the fishing vessel, as determined by national laws or regulations.

3. The competent authorities may in individual cases permit a fishing vessel to put to sea without the full complement of certificated personnel if they are satisfied that no suitable substitutes are available and that having regard to all the circumstances of the case it is safe to allow the vessel to put to sea.

Article 8

The instrument should provide that the minimum age prescribed by national laws or regulations for the issue of a certificate of competency should be not less than—

(a) 20 years in the case of a skipper;

(b) 19 years in the case of a mate;

(c) 20 years in the case of an engineer:

Provided that for the purpose of service as a skipper in a fishing vessel engaged in coastal fishing, and for the purpose of service as an engineer in a fishing vessel of less than 500 horsepower, the minimum age may be fixed at 18 years.

Article 9

1. The instrument should provide that the minimum professional experience prescribed by national laws or regulations for the issue of a skipper's certificate of competency should be not less than three years' sea service in a deck capacity, and an additional 12 months' service as certificated mate on board a fishing vessel: Provided that service for the same period as a fisherman in a fishing vessel which under national laws or regulations is not required to carry a certificated mate may be regarded as equivalent to service as such a mate.

2. Where national laws or regulations provide for the issue of different grades of certificates of competency, full and limited, to skippers of fishing vessels, the nature of the qualifying service as a certificated mate or the type of certificate held while performing such qualifying service should vary accordingly.

Article 10

The instrument should provide that the minimum professional experience prescribed by national laws or regulations for the issue of a mate's certificate of competency should be not less than three years' sea service in a deck capacity.

Article 11

The instrument should provide that the minimum professional experience prescribed by national laws or regulations for the issue of an engineer's certificate of competency should be not less than three years' sea service in the engine room: Provided that for part of that period work in an engineering workshop may be regarded as equivalent to sea service: Provided also that in the case of a certificated skipper or mate a shorter qualifying period of sea service may be specified.

Article 12

The instrument should provide that in respect of persons who have successfully completed an approved training course, the periods of sea service required in virtue of Articles 9, 10 and 11 may be reduced by the period of training, but in no case by more than 12 months.

PART III: EXAMINATIONS

Article 13

The instrument should provide that examinations organised and supervised by the competent authority for the purpose of testing whether candidates for competency certificates possess the qualifications necessary for performing the duties corresponding to the certificates for which they are candidates should require knowledge, appropriate to the categories and grades of certificates, of the following subjects:

(a) in the case of members of the deck department of fishing vessels—

(i) general nautical subjects, including seamanship, shiphandling and safety of life at sea;

(ii) practical navigation, including the use of electronic and mechanical aids to navigation;

(iii) safe working practices, including safety in the handling of fishing gear;

(b) in the case of members of the engine department of fishing vessels—

(i) theory, operation, maintenance and repair of steam or internal combustion engines and related auxiliary equipment;

(ii) operation, maintenance and repair of refrigeration systems, pumps, deck winches and other mechanical equipment of fishing vessels, including the effects on stability;

(iii) principles of shipboard electric power installations, and maintenance and repair of the electrical machinery and equipment of fishing vessels; and

(iv) engineering safety precautions and emergency procedures, including the use of life-saving and fire-fighting appliances.

Article 14

The examinations for deck certificates referred to in Article 13 (a) may also cover the following subjects:

(i) fishing techniques, including where appropriate the operation of electronic equipment for the finding of fish, and operation, maintenance and repair of fishing gear; and

(ii) stowage, cleaning and processing of fish on board.

Article 15

The instrument should provide that, during a period of three years from the date of the coming into force of national laws or regulations giving effect to its provisions, competency certificates may be issued to persons who have not passed an examination of the kind referred to in Articles 13 and 14, but who have in fact had sufficient practical experience of the duties corresponding to the certificate in question and have no record of any serious technical error against them.

Part IV: Enforcement Measures

Article 16

The instrument should provide that—

(a) each Member should ensure the enforcement of national laws or regulations giving effect to its provisions by an efficient system of inspection;

(b) national laws or regulations giving effect to its provisions should provide for the cases in which the authorities of a Member may detain vessels registered in its territory on account of a breach of these laws or regulations.

Article 17

1. The instrument should further provide that national laws or regulations giving effect to its provisions should prescribe penalties or disciplinary measures for cases in which these laws or regulations are not respected.

2. In particular, such penalties or disciplinary measures should be prescribed for cases in which—

(a) a fishing vessel owner or his agent, or a skipper, has engaged a person not certificated as required;

(b) a person has obtained by fraud or forged documents an engagement to perform duties requiring certification without holding the requisite certificate.

Permanent Agricultural Committee

(Seventh Session, Geneva, 22 November-3 December 1965)

TEXTS OF THE CONCLUSIONS AND RESOLUTION ADOPTED

Conclusions concerning the Technical Review of the I.L.O. Rural Development Programme

The Permanent Agricultural Committee—

Recalls the unanimous adoption by the International Labour Conference at its 44th (1960) Session of a resolution concerning the contribution of the International Labour Organisation to the raising of incomes and living conditions in rural communities, with particular reference to countries in process of development, which recommended a considerable expansion of the activities of the International Labour Organisation in the rural sector;

Recalls that the Committee at its Sixth Session (1960) was requested to examine the general conclusions concerning future I.L.O. activities in the rural sector as laid down in the 1960 Conference resolution, with a view to translating them into a practical programme of work and indicating those fields on which it would be desirable to place major emphasis, due account being taken of the great variation in physical, economic, social, demographic and cultural conditions between the different countries and regions;

Notes with satisfaction the action taken by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to allocate additional though limited resources in staff and funds to enable the launching of a special long-term programme of practical research and operational activities designed to raise incomes and living conditions in rural communities in developing countries, in accordance with the directives of the Conference and the conclusions of the Committee;

Notes that this special long-term programme—known as the Rural Development Programme—has now effectively been in operation for three years, and that the purpose of the Governing Body, in deciding to place on the agenda of the Committee at its present session an item concerning the technical review of the Programme, was to enable the Committee to acquaint itself with the way in which its recommendations and those of the Conference had been given effect by the International Labour Office in drawing up the Programme, and to report to the Governing Body on the progress achieved so far and on the orientation that it would be desirable for the Programme to take in the years to come;

Has examined the working paper prepared by the International Labour Office entitled " Technical Review of the I.L.O. Rural Development Programme ", and has noted with interest the information contained therein, as well as the statements made by representatives of the International Labour Office supplementing this information, concerning the balance and content of the Programme, and the way in which the International Labour Office has implemented the various activities included in the Programme during its three years of operation;

While recognising that it is not possible to evaluate fully the results thus far achieved of many projects launched under this Programme both because of the shortness of the period that projects have been in operation and their inherently difficult and pioneering nature, considers that the action taken so far by the International Labour Office within the framework of its Rural Development Programme has generally been in conformity with the directives laid down by the Conference and the recommendations made by the Committee, and notes that certain delays and difficulties which have in some cases affected the timetable of operations originally envisaged were due to factors beyond the Office's control;

In order that the International Labour Organisation's assistance may be effective, stresses that governments should take the necessary measures to ensure that there is full co-ordination and co-operation between the various national authorities concerned and the international experts, and to provide on time the administrative services and material facilities required for the implementation of the projects in question, and that the attention of the governments concerned should be specifically drawn to the provisions of paragraph 10 [1] of the 1960 Conference resolution;

Stresses in particular the importance of the provision from the very beginning of suitably qualified counterpart personnel, or of personnel suitable for training as such, to work alongside the international experts, who will be ready to take over from the experts and continue their work when the international assistance comes to an end;

While recognising that certain long-term projects within the Programme need to be continued for some years, notes that these projects take up a large part of the limited funds available and restrict the flexibility of the Programme. The Committee stresses, therefore, that the International Labour Organisation's Rural Development Programme as financed out of its regular budget should not become a substitute for the vastly superior resource possibilities afforded by the United Nations Special Fund, the Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance, etc., and that the Rural Development Programme should in such cases rather play a pioneering role, being particularly used for paving the way for longer-term and larger-scale activities financed from other sources;

In cognizance of the increasing magnitude and urgency of the problems involved, and the need to assist the developing countries in improving the living and working conditions of their rural communities and in promoting more productive and fuller employment in the rural areas, makes the following recommendations for the continuation of the International Labour Office's activities in the rural sector, on the understanding that, in carrying out these activities, the International Labour Office will continue to collaborate closely and co-ordinate its work with the Food and Agriculture Organisation of the United Nations and other international agencies concerned:

1. The International Labour Organisation should continue to strengthen and expand its activities in the rural sector, by means, where appropriate, of an integrated approach, in accordance with the directives laid down in the 1960 Conference resolution and in the conclusions adopted by the Committee at its Sixth Session. It is essential that adequate resources in staff and funds should be allocated for this purpose, and that they be so used as to benefit the greatest number of rural people in the developing countries as possible.

2. It would be particularly important in this connection to devote attention to conditions of work and life of agricultural workers of all categories; to rural employment promotion; to vocational training of rural people for farm and non-farm occupations; to the problems arising in connection with the processing and marketing of agricultural products and the provision and improvement of rural credit facilities (in full-co-operation with the Food and Agriculture Organisation of the United Nations); to the problems of rural co-operatives; to the International Labour Organisation's contribution to the concerted international action in agrarian reform and community development, in implementation, with respect to the former, of the resolution on agrarian reform, with particular reference to employment and social aspects, adopted by the International Labour Conference at its 49th (1965) Session; to assistance in the application of standards set by the International Labour Conference; to inter-agency activities and joint projects, particularly in respect of integrated projects and vocational training (e.g. vocational training in forestry work); and to practical studies and investigations of the experiences of countries in the implementation of national agrarian reform and rural development programmes.

3. In carrying out the technical assistance activities under the Rural Development Programme, the International Labour Organisation missions should, in conformity with the tripartite character of the International Labour Organisation, consult and work in cooperation with representative employers' and workers' organisations in the rural sector.

4. The attention of the governments of countries receiving assistance under the Rural Development Programme should be drawn to the provisions of paragraph 10 of the 1960 Conference resolution and to the indispensability of their taking the appropriate measures to help select suitable sites for the projects and to ensure that projects receive the required support from the national authorities concerned, including the provision and training of counterpart personnel, for the successful implementation and punctual conclusion of the international assistance provided and enabling the recipient country to continue action after the termination of such assistance and to derive maximum benefit therefrom.

5. Governments receiving long-term assistance under the Rural Development Programme should be urged to make every effort to ensure as soon as possible the use of other means of financing the continuation of long-term projects, including the possibility of making appropriate requests to the United Nations Special Fund or the Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance. The greatest possible effort should be made for the use of these or related sources of financing in connection with long-term activities which may be undertaken in the future.

6. The International Labour Office should provide, at appropriate intervals and as practicable, detailed information on the results of important projects undertaken under the Rural Development Programme, including an assessment of the achievements, so that the benefit of the experiences gained may be more widely available. Particular attention should be paid to assessing the value of the results of such projects to the developing countries generally in the formulation of plans for the improvement of the economic and social standards of their rural communities.

Conclusions concerning the Role of Agricultural Organisations in Promoting Economic and Social Development in Rural Areas

The Permanent Agricultural Committee—

Is aware of the major place which rural organisations of various types (e.g. general farm organisations, agricultural trade unions, agricultural employers' organisations, rural co-operatives) occupy in the institutional framework of many countries, and of the important and significant role which they play in promoting economic and social development in the rural sector;

Realises the potentialities of such organisations to play an even greater role in this respect;

Notes with regret that the growth of rural organisations has been slow in many developing countries, despite the fact that economic and social development is particularly urgent in the rural sector in these countries;

Has examined the working paper prepared by the International Labour Office on " The Role of Agricultural Organisations in the Economic and Social Development of Rural Areas ";

Has noted the supplementary information given by representatives of the International Labour Office and by the members of the Committee, as well as by representatives of international agricultural organisations;

Is aware that in many cases rural organisations have been able to render extensive services in the formulation and implementation of measures of agricultural policy;

Is conscious of the contribution that rural organisations make and can make to economic and social development in the rural sector by such means as participation in statutory bodies, conclusion of collective agreements; social protection of rural populations, in particular ensuring the improvement of their living and working conditions; achieving increased production of agricultural produce; provision or distribution of credit to agricultural producers; marketing and processing of agricultural produce; implementation of various agrarian reform measures; education and dissemination of technical information; defence of the freedom of rural people to form associations to attain economic and social goals;

Is convinced that every effort should be made to foster the growth of independent rural organisations in a co-ordinated manner so as to enable rural people effectively to further their own welfare and fully to contribute to national economic and social development;

Appreciates that, while it is not always advisable for developing countries to follow exactly the pattern of rural organisations in the more advanced countries, the principles, functions and experience of such organisations can be of value to the developing countries and are capable of adaptation to local conditions in a way which would still enable them to make a significant contribution to economic and social development;

Notes in this connection that certain indigenous forms of organisation may constitute in a number of cases a sound basis for the establishment of more modern forms of organisation, which organisations can begin to contribute to economic and social development at an early stage;

Considers that rural co-operatives are one of the most effective organisations for rural development, and that they and other self-help groups have a particular role to play in economic and social development, since they can be introduced into small communities and their effect on the standard of living of people in rural areas can be both evident and capable of rapid achievement;

It therefore notes with satisfaction the already considerable work of the International Labour Organisation in this field, and that the question of " The Role of Co-operatives in the Economic and Social Development of Developing Countries " has been placed on the agenda of the International Labour Conference;

Notes also with satisfaction in this connection the close co-ordination and collaboration between the International Labour Organisation and the Food and Agriculture Organisation of the United Nations in the field of co-operatives;

Considers that constructive measures capable of encouraging the creation of strong and independent rural organisations and of accelerating their development should be taken, and include—

(a) removal of legislative restrictions, general ratification and full application of international labour Conventions, particularly the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948, and the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949;

(b) promotion of educational and vocational training programmes among rural people;

(c) provision of training on rural organisation for the people concerned;

(d) ensuring the participation of rural organisations in the activities of planning and policy-making bodies of various types, as appropriate;

(e) associating rural organisations with the implementation of development measures;

(f) encouraging rural organisations to engage, in addition to the defence of the social and economic interests of their members, in the dissemination of the results of technical research in the provision of marketing and processing facilities for agricultural produce, and in the promotion of communal, recreational and leisure-time activities;

The Committee consequently recommends that the International Labour Organisation, in collaboration, as appropriate, with other United Nations agencies and particularly with the Food and Agriculture Organisation of the United Nations, as well as with the international non-governmental organisations concerned, should—

(1) prepare as a matter of priority a detailed study on the role of rural organisations in the economic and social development of rural areas, and on the reasons for their slow growth in many developing countries;

(2) undertake a programme of technical co-operation, and of research generally designed to encourage and foster the formation of independent rural organisations and the increase of their effectiveness, and make available information on experience in this respect;

(3) organise, after careful preparatory studies of specific needs, appropriate educational and training activities, designed to ensure that the qualified personnel necessary to administer rural organisations, and to carry out their advisory functions, are available;

(4) explore the possibilities of practical action by organising meetings, seminars and study tours and granting fellowships.

Conclusions concerning Vocational Preparation and Employment of Rural Youth

The Permanent Agricultural Committee—

Recognises that the economic and social progress of developing countries in particular is largely dependent on the development of the rural economy and on the improvement of conditions of work, the standard of living and incomes of rural people;

Recognises that rural young people can and must make an essential contribution to this process if afforded an opportunity to do so through programmes suited to their age and their capacities;

Considers that the increase of employment opportunities for rural youth should constitute an essential feature of economic and social development plans;

Considers that in the rural areas of many developing countries unemployment and underemployment, particularly of young people, reach disquieting proportions, especially among the great mass of primary school leavers, and that the conditions in which rural young people live and work are unsatisfactory;

Notes that this situation induces an increasing number of generally unskilled young people to leave the land for urban areas where employment opportunities are very limited, the consequences being urban overcrowding and a higher incidence of unemployment among youth;

Recognises that agriculture is not only a way of life but a vocation, and that recent technological changes are such that the technical knowledge acquired by young agricultural workers through traditional methods is no longer sufficient; that the transition from subsistence agriculture to market agriculture obliges the young agricultural worker to extend considerably the range of his technical, economic and general knowledge; and that rural producers must face rapid developments which require improved techniques, whether the materials used are traditional or new;

Considers that the prospects for young people to find work or to increase their income depend to a large extent upon the technical training which they have received, and that almost everywhere the lack of training facilities and the inadequacy of training methods and programmes of training constitute serious obstacles to the improvement of the conditions of rural youth;

Has noted the appeal made under the Freedom from Hunger Campaign to the rural young people of all countries with a view to securing their participation in this campaign;

Refers to the instruments and the resolutions adopted by the International Labour Conference at its various sessions, in particular to the Vocational Training (Agriculture) Recommendation, 1956; to the resolution concerning the contribution of the International Labour Organisation to the raising of incomes and living conditions, with particular reference to countries in process of development (1960); to the resolution on agrarian reform, with particular reference to economic and social aspects (1965); as well as to various resolutions adopted by regional conferences of the International Labour Organisation and earlier sessions of the Permanent Agricultural Committee;

Has been informed of the technical assistance which the International Labour Organisation can provide under its Rural Development Programme and the Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance, of the programmes financed by the United Nations Special Fund, etc., whose object is, in particular, to increase the possibilities of employment in the rural zones and to develop vocational training for rural youth;

Has examined the report on vocational preparation and employment of rural youth, and has taken note of the supplementary information provided by its members as well as by representatives of the International Labour Office;

Expresses the opinion that, to deal in a constructive manner with the problem, it is necessary—to take all appropriate measures to increase employment opportunities for rural youth, taking into account the importance in this respect of agrarian reform, land settlement and the setting up of rural and other appropriate industries in carefully selected areas; to organise, in rural areas, education and vocational training for rural young people in a manner suitable to fit them for productive employment, and in particular to set up programmes of pre-vocational training for rural school leavers, including those who have had only a few years of education; to organise special training programmes for the beneficiaries of agrarian reform or land settlement, and for the technicians responsible for the implementation of such measures, in order that they may derive the maximum benefit therefrom; to take measures to increase production and productivity in the rural sector, and consequently incomes, particularly through the introduction of better techniques; to set on foot programmes of vocational training calculated to improve the conditions of work in agriculture and related activities, to make rural people more receptive to progress and to draw the maximum from the resources invested therein; to take measures to improve social services and to organise recreational facilities in rural communities.

I. Consequently recommends that within the framework of its research and operational activities the International Labour Organisation should encourage countries to formulate national programmes, integrated within over-all social and economic planning, for the promotion of employment and vocational training, and to pay due regard to the special needs of rural youth, in particular rural school leavers, when drawing up such programmes. These programmes should—

(1) be based upon a careful study of available natural and manpower resources, the degree to which they are utilised, and the manpower implications of development plans;

(2) comprise the formulation of employment promotion and vocational training objectives with due regard to the present and future requirements to be met and existing possibilities;

(3) establish a quantitative and qualitative assessment of the existing educational and training systems, including apprenticeship;

(4) ensure the establishment of appropriate machinery for the planning and implementation of co-ordinated rural employment promotion and vocational training programmes;

(5) include pedagogical, sociological and other types of research into the best methods of training rural young people as well as into the most suitable ways of integrating them into the rural community, with a view not only to bringing them technical progress but also to enabling them to assimilate it more easily and to impart it to others, within the farm or undertaking as well as within the community as a whole. It would be desirable for such research to devote particular attention to rural sociological problems, and for the experts working in the rural area to have the continuous assistance of specialists in this field;

(6) provide for the organisation, whenever possible, of vocational guidance and placement services in rural areas, in such a manner as to keep the rural population, and the young people in particular, informed as to employment possibilities and as to the ways in which they may prepare themselves for such employment;

(7) provide for the organisation, in rural areas, of social services and organised leisure-time activities, in order to attract young people and to retain them in agriculture and other rural occupations.

II. Recommends further that the International Labour Organisation should undertake practical action on the basis of the following principles:

(1) national studies should be systematically undertaken in order to assess the manpower problems and vocational training needs of rural youth, and to suggest how these problems may be solved with the technical assistance of the International Labour Organisation, in order to assist the countries concerned to establish a long-term policy in this field and to establish the necessary administrative framework;

(2) the programmes of vocational training should be adapted to the employment opportunities and needs of the countries concerned, be sufficiently flexible as regards their content, their duration and their level, take account of the pressing economic and social needs of rural development, as well as the need for a well-balanced general and technical training, and be within the limits of the financial and staffing resources of those countries;

(3) pilot projects should be undertaken in order to help countries in assessing the magnitude and nature of the employment and vocational training problems of young people in rural areas and to demonstrate how close collaboration between the local communities, public authorities and international organisations can help in solving these problems;

(4) long-term practical action, commenced under the Rural Development Programme and followed up by other forms of assistance, in particular that granted by the Special Fund of the United Nations, should assist countries to train the instructors needed to staff the increased numbers of training centres, either for young people leaving school and pre-vocational centres, or young rural workers who will become the elements upon which large-scale action to spread technical knowledge could later on be based;

(5) particular attention should be given to the training of instructors or teachers, and to their in-service and refresher training, in order that they may continuously adapt their educational activities to the development of techniques of agricultural production and marketing;

(6) the formation of organisations of rural youth able to contribute to economic and social progress should be encouraged, by the organisation of seminars, study tours and other activities;

(7) existing collaboration between the International Labour Organisation and various international organisations, in particular the United Nations, including the United Nations Children's Fund, the Food and Agriculture Organisation of the United Nations and the other specialised agencies, should be expanded through the effective co-ordination of their respective activities, in order to formulate and make available to the countries concerned concerted programmes of action designed to bring about early improvements;

(8) adequate resources should be set aside, under the Rural Development Programme and other funds, to expand the activities of the International Labour Organisation for the vocational and pre-vocational training of rural youth, in particular primary school leavers in rural areas.

Resolution concerning the Improvement of the Conditions of Women in Rural Areas

The Permanent Agricultural Committee,

Conscious of the important role which women play in the rural sector and the necessity of improving their conditions of life and work and of developing by all possible means their vocational and pre-vocational training and their employment opportunities in order that they should no longer be prompted to leave the country areas in excessive numbers and should be enabled to bring their full contribution to the economic and social development of rural areas;

Takes note of the wish expressed by the Meeting of Consultants on Women Workers' Problems at its session of September 1965 in Geneva that the Permanent Agricultural Committee should examine at one of its early future sessions the problem of the improvement of the conditions of women in rural areas and of their training;

Expresses the hope that this suggestion will be taken into consideration in drawing up the agenda of the next session of the Committee.

Conclusions concerning the Stabilisation of the Prices of Agricultural Products and the World Food Programme

The Permanent Agricultural Committee,

Recognising the urgency of improving the economic and social conditions of rural areas and the vital necessity of increasing world agricultural production to meet the needs of a rapidly rising world population,

Bearing in mind that most of the developing countries, in order to develop their economies, depend at present to a large extent upon the returns of exports of a single or a few agricultural products whose price fluctuations on the world market they are unable to control;

Appreciating the role which the International Labour Organisation's Rural Development Programme and the related activities of other international agencies can play in these respects,

Considering, however, that neither international nor national programmes for rural development and increased agricultural production can achieve their objectives and that the value of all these measures will be nullified or substantially reduced unless fair and stable prices are assured for agricultural products;

Recommends that the attention of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, the Food and Agriculture Organisation of the United Nations and other international agencies concerned be drawn to the urgent and pressing need for—

(1) the conclusion of measures such as international commodity agreements which will ensure fair and stable prices for agricultural products;

(2) the continuation of the World Food Programme on a substantially increased scale.

Relations with Other International Organisations

Agreement between the International Labour Organisation and the Organisation of African Unity [1]

PREAMBLE

Whereas all Members of the International Labour Organisation have, by the Declaration of Philadelphia embodied in the Constitution as a statement of the aims and purposes of the Organisation, solemnly affirmed that " all human beings, irrespective of race, creed or sex, have the right to pursue both their material well-being and their spiritual development in conditions of freedom and dignity, of economic security and equal opportunity ",

Whereas the purposes for which the Organisation of African Unity has been established include the co-ordination and intensification of the co-operation and efforts of its member States to achieve a better life for the peoples of Africa and to promote international co-operation, having due regard to the Charter of the United Nations and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights,

The International Labour Organisation and the Organisation of African Unity,

Desirous of contributing, within the general framework of the Charter of the United Nations, the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation and the Charter of the Organisation of African Unity, to the effective accomplishment in Africa of those objectives which they have in common, in the light of their respective world-wide and regional responsibilities;

Have agreed upon the following:

ARTICLE I

Mutual Consultation

1. The International Labour Organisation and the Organisation of African Unity will consult regularly on matters of common interest for the purpose of furthering the effective accomplishment in the African States of their common objectives.

2. The International Labour Organisation will inform the Organisation of African Unity of any plans for the development of its technical activities in the social and labour fields within the territories of the Members of the Organisation of African Unity and will consider any observations concerning such plans which may be communicated to it by the Organisation of African Unity with a view to accomplishing effective co-ordination between the two organisations.

3. The Organisation of African Unity will inform the International Labour Organisation of any plans for the development of its technical activities in the social and labour fields and will consider any observations concerning such plans which may be communicated to it by the International Labour Organisation with a view to accomplishing effective co-ordination between the two organisations.

[1] In accordance with the provisions of article VI, paragraph 1, this Agreement entered into force on 25 November 1965, the date on which it was signed by the duly authorised representatives of the two organisations.

Article II

Reciprocal Representation

1. For the purpose of furthering the effective accomplishment in the member States of the Organisation of African Unity of the objectives which the two organisations have in common, the International Labour Organisation will invite the Organisation of African Unity to be represented at meetings of the International Labour Conference and at meetings within or particularly concerning the African countries, members of the Organisation of African Unity, convened under the auspices of the International Labour Organisation, including the meetings of the African Regional Conference and the African Advisory Committee of the International Labour Organisation.

2. The Organisation of African Unity will likewise invite the International Labour Organisation to be represented at the meetings of its Economic and Social Commission as well as at all other technical and scientific meetings convened under the auspices of the Organisation of African Unity at which subjects for discussion include matters within the competence of the International Labour Organisation.

3. Appropriate arrangements may be made by agreement from time to time for the reciprocal representation of the International Labour Organisation and the Organisation of African Unity at other meetings convened under their respective auspices which consider matters in which the other organisation has an interest.

4. The Director-General of the International Labour Office and the Administrative Secretary-General of the Organisation of African Unity will each appoint a liaison officer to maintain close, direct and continuing contact between their two organisations with a view to ensuring the implementation of the provisions of the present Agreement.

Article III

Exchange of Information

1. The International Labour Organisation and the Organisation of African Unity will combine their efforts to obtain the best use of statistical and legislative information and to ensure the most effective utilisation of their resources in the assembling, analysis, publication and diffusion of such information with a view to reducing the burdens on the governments and other organisations from which such information is collected.

2. Subject to such arrangements as may be necessary for the safeguarding of confidential material, the fullest and promptest exchange of information and documents concerning social matters of common interest will be made between the International Labour Organisation and the Organisation of African Unity.

3. The International Labour Organisation will be kept informed by the Organisation of African Unity of developments in the work of the latter which are of interest to the International Labour Organisation.

4. The Organisation of African Unity will be kept informed by the International Labour Organisation of developments in the work of the latter which are of interest to the Organisation of African Unity.

Article IV

Technical Co-operation

1. Whenever desirable for the development of their activities in fields of mutual concern, the International Labour Organisation and the Organisation of African Unity may each seek the other's technical co-operation where it is specially equipped to assist in the development of such activities.

2. Every effort will be made to meet any such request for technical co-operation in a manner to be agreed in such cases as may arise.

3. The International Labour Organisation and the Organisation of African Unity, upon request and within their available resources, shall assist each other as regards administrative, conference and general service staff, as well as in the provision of experts on economic, social and labour matters. This assistance shall be furnished with due regard to the exclusively international character of the staff of the two Organisations, and to their obligations under the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation and the Charter of the Organisation of African Unity as well as to their respective staff rules and regulations.

4. Likewise, within the limits of their resources, the two organisations shall assist each other in the professional training of the different categories of personnel specified in paragraph 3 above.

ARTICLE V

Supplementary Arrangements

The Director-General of the International Labour Office and the Administrative Secretary-General of the Organisation of African Unity will make appropriate arrangements to ensure close collaboration and liaison between the staffs of the two organisations in matters of common interest and, in particular, between the Directors of the International Labour Organisation field offices in Africa and the General Secretariat of the Organisation of African Unity.

ARTICLE VI

Entry into Force

1. The present Agreement will enter into force from the date at which it is signed by the authorised representatives of the International Labour Organisation and the Organisation of African Unity.

2. The Agreement may be modified with the consent of the two parties.

In witness whereof, the Director-General of the International Labour Office, duly authorised by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, and the Administrative Secretary-General of the Organisation of African Unity, duly authorised by the Council of Ministers of the Organisation of African Unity, signed the present Agreement.

Geneva, 25 November 1965.

Judgments Given by the Administrative Tribunal of the International Labour Organisation

Text of the Judgment Given in the Case of: Wipf against United International Bureaux for the Protection of Intellectual Property

INTERNATIONAL LABOUR ORGANISATION

ADMINISTRATIVE TRIBUNAL

Fifteenth Ordinary Session (Geneva, 1-6 November 1965)

Registry's translation, the French text alone being authoritative.

In re Wipf

Judgment No. 86

The Administrative Tribunal,

Considering the complaint against the United International Bureaux for the Protection of Intellectual Property, drawn up by Mr. Wipf on 23 April 1965;

A. Considering that the said complaint prays for the quashing of a decision to assign the complainant to a grade and salary scale established for the purpose of assimilating the conditions of employment of the staff of the United International Bureaux to those of the common system of the United Nations and the specialised agencies, and further prays for the regrading of the complainant in a higher grade corresponding to the level of his former duties and responsibilities;

B. Considering that by an instrument dated 25 May 1965, filed with the Registrar prior to the filing of the Organisation's reply, the complainant stated that he withdrew any claim whatsoever with respect to the relief prayed for in his complaint; and furthermore that, by letter dated 1 June 1965, the Organisation stated that it had no other submissions to make;

DECISION

The Tribunal notifies the parties that Mr. Wipf's withdrawal of suit is hereby recorded.

In witness of this judgment, delivered in public sitting in Geneva on 6 November 1965 by Mr. Maxime Letourneur, President, Mr. André Grisel, Vice-President, and the Right Honourable Lord Devlin, P.C., Judge, the aforementioned have hereunto attached their signatures to these presents, as well as myself, Lemoine, Registrar of the Tribunal.

Text of the Judgment Given in the Case of: Di Giuliomaria against Food and Agriculture Organisation of the United Nations

INTERNATIONAL LABOUR ORGANISATION

ADMINISTRATIVE TRIBUNAL

Fifteenth Ordinary Session (Geneva, 1-6 November 1965)

Registry's translation, the French text alone being authoritative.

In re Di Giuliomaria — Judgment No. 87

The Administrative Tribunal,

Considering the complaint against the Food and Agriculture Organisation of the United Nations drawn up by Mr. Di Giuliomaria and dated 15 March 1965, and the Organisation's reply dated 27 April 1965;

Considering articles II and VIII of the Statute of the Tribunal and provisions 301.081, 301.082 and 301.102 of the Staff Regulations of the Organisation, provisions 302.82 of the Staff Rules and provisions 330.150, 330.151, 330.152, 330.200, 330.251 and 330.300 of the Administrative Manual of the Organisation;

Having heard, in oral proceedings on 1 November 1965, Mr. Jacques Mercier, counsel for the complainant, and Mr. Saint-Pol, agent of the Organisation, as well as Mr. Di Giuliomaria, who was questioned by the Tribunal;

Considering that the material facts of the case are as follows:

A. The complainant, who entered the service of the Organisation on 26 February 1962, was employed as a locally recruited administrative clerk in grade G. 4 of the General Service category, and since 1 September of the same year had held an indefinite appointment.

B. An Assembly of the Staff Association of the Organisation, held on 18 December 1963, decided on the proposal of Mr. Di Giuliomaria to reject the report presented to it by the Staff Council (a body which, under the terms of provision 301.081 of the Staff Regulations, is elected by the staff and responsible to it and is entrusted with representing the interests of the staff in its relations with the Director-General), to withdraw its confidence from the members of the Council and to relieve them of their functions, while his proposal to dissolve the Association and reconstitute it in the form of a trade union was referred to a committee elected by the Assembly, to which Mr. Di Giuliomaria was appointed. At General Assemblies of the Association held on 21 and 28 February and 4 and 11 March 1964, to which the report of the above-mentioned committee was presented, it was decided, first, to appoint a committee to aid the Staff Council in its negotiations with the administration for the improvement of General Service salaries, Mr. Di Giuliomaria being elected a member of this committee and subsequently assuming its chairmanship, and secondly, to set up a committee to redraft the constitution of the Association in accordance with the Assembly's instructions.

C. The complainant acted as Chairman of the Salary Committee until his dismissal and in that capacity took part, together with members of the Staff Council, in negotiations relating to the improvement of General Service category salaries, both in the Joint Advisory Committee provided for under provision 302.82 of the Staff Rules and directly with the competent administrative authorities, including the Director-General himself, without the representative capacity or mandate of Mr. Di Giuliomaria being challenged at any time. During this period the committee of which Mr. Di Giuliomaria was Chairman had on several occasions publicly expressed its reservations in regard to the proposals for the improvement of General Service category salaries which were being worked out by the administration. Having been informed of the proposals which the Director-General was submitting to the Finance Committee of the Council of the Organisation, the Staff Council expressed its objections to them by a telegram dated 28 May 1964, with particular reference to the methods proposed for a statistical survey for the purpose of reviewing the General Service salary scale and to its own participation in such a survey. As a result of the Finance Committee's decisions, which, in accordance with the Director-General's proposals, recommended that for the adjustment of General Service category salaries a wage index should be substituted for a cost-of-living index, the latter being less favourable, and that a statistical survey should be undertaken by new methods to serve as the basis for an advanced review of salary scales, a difference of opinion arose between the Staff Council, which was prepared to accept these measures and to participate in the proposed survey, and the Salary Committee of which Mr. Di Giuliomaria was Chairman, which took the view that the objections expressed in the telegram of 28 May 1964 should be reaffirmed, that participation in the statistical survey should be refused, that the staff representatives should be withdrawn from the joint machinery, that a Staff Assembly should be convened and the possibility of a protest demonstration in the form of a strike considered. The Staff Council having refused to follow these suggestions, a Staff Assembly was convened through the agency of the members of the Salary Committee of which Mr. Di Giuliomaria was Chairman.

D. A Staff Assembly having been convened for 25 June 1964, Mr. Di Giuliomaria, at a date which is not specified but was probably 23 June 1964, distributed to the staff as a whole a statement or circular entitled " Some Remarks on the Attitude of the Staff Council and Some Proposals for the Next Assembly of 25 June ". The full text of this document, included in the dossier, has been recognised as authentic by both parties. In this document its author declares that he takes full personal responsibility for it in order to avoid any difficulties arising from the fact that two of the members of the Salary Committee did not concur in the majority view, while stating, however, that as other members of the staff have made their views known by the same method he is all the more entitled to do so inasmuch as he is a staff representative. Mr. Di Giuliomaria then criticises the Staff Council for its lack of democratic spirit (shown by its refusal to consult the Staff Assembly), its lack of determination and its contradictoriness (shown by its change of mind in regard to participation in the statistical survey), its lack of autonomy (indicated by its passive acceptance of the administration's decisions) and its inefficiency (indicated by its lack of initiative and its reluctance to hear the views of the Salary Committee). The statement goes on to propose that, having regard to the deterioration of the situation since the date of the preceding Assembly on 5 May 1964, the Assembly should—(a) withdraw its confidence from the Staff Council and remove all its members from office; (b) decide not to participate in any way in the statistical survey and to annul any decisions in that regard already taken by the Staff Council, proposing instead to maintain a demand for a 20 per cent. increase in salaries with effect from 1 January 1964; and (c) demand that the F.A.O. member countries form a committee to examine the relations between the Director-General and the staff, the author of the statement adding the comment that in his belief the situation of the staff and the consequent dissatisfaction did not derive from the fact that the Director-General might be ill advised or might not know the facts of the situation. Finally, after emphasising that everyone is entitled to have his own ideas in regard to problems of staff representation, the author of the memorandum expresses his intention of considering joining an Italian trade union which would be better able to look after his interests than the Staff Council, and his desire to discuss beforehand any objections to this course that might be submitted to him.

E. On 25 June 1964 the Staff Assembly, by 193 votes to 93, with 19 abstentions, passed a vote of no confidence in the Staff Council and decided to remove its members. On 26 June 1964 the complainant was summarily dismissed.

F. The complainant's appeal for reconsideration of his case on 7 July 1964 was rejected on 17 July 1964, the Appeals Committee issued an unfavourable recommendation on the appeal lodged with it by the complainant, and the Director-General's decision to confirm his summary dismissal, dated 18 December 1964, was received by the complainant on 21 December 1964. The complainant thereupon submitted to the Tribunal the complaint under reference, in the conclusions of which he prays that the decision to dismiss the complainant should be quashed, that the complainant should be reinstated, and that compensation should be paid to him for the injury he had suffered as a result of the above-mentioned decision.

G. The Organisation in its conclusions prays that it may please the Tribunal to find that the conduct of the complainant was such as to warrant his summary dismissal and that the procedure followed was in conformity with the relevant rules and regulations, and to dismiss the complaint. In support of these conclusions the Organisation charges the complainant, in the light of the above-mentioned statement, with insubordination and impertinence, misrepresentation of facts, incitement to agitation and offensive and injurious language. In subsidiary conclusions submitted during the oral proceedings the agent of the Organisation stated that in the very unlikely event of the Tribunal finding that the complaint was well founded, the granting of redress in the form of compensation for injury suffered would appear to be preferable to the complainant's reinstatement.

CONSIDERATIONS

On the procedure before the Tribunal:

1. The complainant's counsel, after the close of the last public hearing, submitted ten documents which had not been communicated to the agent of the Organisation and upon which he therefore had no opportunity to comment. In conformity with the principle that each party shall be fully heard on all the evidence admitted, these documents were excluded from the dossier on which the Tribunal took its decision.

On the legality of the decision impugned:

2. In the first place, whereas under provision 301.081 of the Staff Regulations the Staff Council is the only body officially representing the staff in its dealings with the administrative authorities of F.A.O., the Staff Association, in spite of its private character, is a lawful association which has in fact been recognised by the Director-General, its representatives having moreover been received by him on several occasions. Hence, in submitting to the sessions of the General Assembly of the Association motions pertaining to the staff's demands, Mr. Di Giuliomaria was merely availing himself of the right of any member of the staff to defend his occupational interests, subject only to his duty to observe the moderation incumbent on any public official.

Subsequently, however, he was appointed by the Assembly as a member of a special Salary Committee, of which he became Chairman, and from that date he carried on his activities as a representative of the Staff Association which had charged him with a specific mission; and in spite of his claim to be acting in a personal capacity it was in his representative capacity that he drafted and circulated the statement entitled " Some Remarks on the Attitude of the Staff Council and Some Proposals for the Next Assembly of 25 June ", the distribution of which led to the summary dismissal of the complainant for serious misconduct by the decision of 26 June 1964 referred to the Tribunal.

Without it being necessary to consider what the complainant's position would have been as a mere staff member, it may be observed that in his capacity of staff representative Mr. Di Giuliomaria had responsibilities but also enjoyed special rights, such as a considerable freedom of action and expression and the right to criticise the Staff Council and even, to some extent, the F.A.O. authorities; he also had special obligations, such as the obligation to act solely in defence of the interests of the staff and the strict duty not to abuse these rights by using methods or expressions incompatible with the decorum appropriate both to his status as a civil servant and to the functions entrusted to him by his colleagues.

3. Secondly, if the administrative authorities of F.A.O. consider that an official has behaved improperly, they are normally required to follow the disciplinary procedure laid down by provisions 330.130, 330.200 and 330.300 of the Administrative Manual, which provides specific safeguards for the official concerned. Consequently, by reason of its severity and of the fact that no formalities are prescribed for its application summary dismissal must necessarily be an exceptional measure which can be allowed only under an express provision and in accordance with the terms of such provision.

Provision 330.251 of the F.A.O. Administrative Manual permits summary dismissal in the following terms:

330.251. Imposition of this disciplinary measure consists in the termination of a staff member without benefit of notice period. The measure may be imposed only by the Director-General. It is imposed only when the misconduct of the staff member concerned is so serious that it has jeopardised or is likely to jeopardise the reputation of the Organisation and its staff.

4. In taking the impugned decision of 26 June 1964 under article 330.251 cited above, the Director-General took the view that the serious misconduct justifying summary dismissal was manifested in the aforementioned statement by Mr. Di Giuliomaria's insubordination and impertinence, misrepresentation of facts and incitement to agitation, and by his injurious language.

(a) These specific charges related to parts of the statement which criticised the action of the Director-General and of the Staff Council.

(i) So far as he himself is concerned, the Director-General charges the complainant, first, with having asked States Members of F.A.O. to form a Committee to examine the relations between the Director-General and the staff, and secondly, with having stated that the Director-General was not unaware of the unsatisfactory situation of the staff, thus implying that he had deliberately refused to improve it.

On the first point, it appears from the terms actually used by Mr. Di Giuliomaria in the original version of the statement that he did not make a direct appeal to the member States, but merely asked that they should be invited to form such a committee; in the light of the terms actually used by the complainant it cannot be asserted that in presenting this demand he was refusing to follow the procedure legally applicable to relations with the staff; at the most he was challenging its effectiveness. Furthermore, without its being necessary to consider whether this demand in itself implied some lack of the proper discretion which the complainant was bound to observe towards the Director-General, the fact that he made it did not in any case amount to an act of insubordination or impertinence.

On the second point, the sentence at issue at most implied that the Director-General had deliberately refused to allocate for staff purposes sums provided for in the F.A.O. budget for programme purposes, and that the complainant did not agree with the decision taken in this respect by competent authority, but this cannot be regarded as disrespectful or impertinent.

If Mr. Di Giuliomaria did not mention in his statement that at the beginning of June the Finance Committee had accepted the Director-General's recommendations concerning salary adjustments for the category of staff concerned, although he could not have been unaware of these facts when he drafted the statement, his silence can be explained by the fact that the principle of the Finance Committee's proposals to replace the cost-of-living index by a wages index and to review the salary scale on the basis of a statistical survey to be carried out by new methods, was contrary to the demands he had been pressing for several months past. The complainant may perhaps have misunderstood the importance and scope of the action taken by the F.A.O. directorate, but the possibly mistaken view he expressed in stating that the situation had deteriorated since the month of May cannot in the circumstances, and having regard to what has been said above, be described as misrepresentation of facts.

(ii) So far as the Staff Council is concerned, the decision impugned complains that Mr. Di Giuliomaria used injurious language towards the Council.

While the Staff Council is the official representative body of the staff in its relations with the F.A.O. authorities, it is not itself one of these authorities. As has already been noted, the Council is elected by the staff and is responsible to it under provision 301.081 of the Staff Regulations.

This necessarily implies that the Council's attitude and actions may be criticised—and even sharply criticised—by the staff without any restrictions other than those already indicated; it also implies that any member of the staff is entitled to express disapproval of serving members of the Council or to call on them to resign.

It does not appear that in his statement Mr. Di Giuliomaria abused his right of criticism or that he used injurious or defamatory language.

(b) In the written memorandum it presented to the Tribunal the Organisation submitted or specified two additional charges to the effect that by circulating his statement Mr. Di Giuliomaria was fostering useless agitation within F.A.O., and that he had urged staff members of the Organisation to join Italian trade unions.

On the first point, the mere fact that the Finance Committee's recommendations did not fully satisfy the category of officials concerned justified the complainant's action for the fulfilment of his demands on 23 June 1964; his activities still had an occupational objective.

On the second point, without expressing any view on the question whether a staff member of an international organisation can legally join a trade union of the country in which the organisation has its headquarters, a question which does not arise in the present case, the Tribunal considers that it follows from the terms of the complainant's statement that the charge against him has no factual basis.

5. It follows from the preceding considerations that the conduct which was deemed to justify Mr. Di Giuliomaria's summary dismissal did not constitute " misconduct " serious enough to jeopardise or to be likely to jeopardise the reputation of the Organisation or its staff; that hence it did not fall within the terms of provision 330.251 of the Administrative Manual cited above; and consequently, that the measure taken against the complainant was not justified and that the complaint is therefore well founded.

6. Article VIII of the Statute of the Administrative Tribunal provides that if the Tribunal is satisfied that the complaint was well founded it " shall order the rescinding of the decision impugned or the performance of the obligation relied upon. If such rescinding or execution is not possible or advisable, the Tribunal shall award the complainant compensation for the injury caused to him. "

Having regard to the present situation within F.A.O., resulting principally from the present dispute, the Tribunal considers the rescinding of the decision impugned to be inadvisable, and considers that in the circumstances of the case the complainant should be awarded compensation for the injury he has suffered.

7. The Tribunal considers that, after an appraisal of all the circumstances of the case, the proper amount to award Mr. Di Giuliomaria as compensation is 5 million Italian liras.

DECISION

1. The complaint is held to be well founded.

2. The rescinding of the decision impugned being inadvisable, compensation in the amount of 5 million Italian liras is awarded to Mr. Di Giuliomaria against the Food and Agriculture Organisation of the United Nations, for the injury caused to him.

3. The costs incurred by the complainant in connection with the present complaint are awarded against the Organisation and will be fixed by order of the President of the Tribunal.

Text of the Judgment Given in the Case of: Kissaun against World Health Organisation

INTERNATIONAL LABOUR ORGANISATION

ADMINISTRATIVE TRIBUNAL

Fifteenth Ordinary Session (Geneva, 1-6 November 1965)

Registry's translation, the French text alone being authoritative.

In re Kissaun

(Fixing of Compensation) Judgment No. 88

The Administrative Tribunal,

Considering the memorandum dated 25 March 1965 by which Mr. Kissaun, in default of any settlement between the parties, prays the Tribunal to fix the amount of compensation payable to him by the World Health Organisation under an earlier judgment of the Tribunal, the reply of the Organisation dated 28 April 1965, the rejoinder of the complainant dated 13 May 1965 and supporting documents, and the observations of the Organisation on the said rejoinder and its annexes set out in a letter to the Registrar dated 9 June 1965;

Considering article VIII of the Statute of the Tribunal;

Considering Judgment No. 69, delivered by the Tribunal on 11 September 1964;

Considering that the material facts of the case are as follows:

A. In its judgment of 11 September 1964, quashing the decision not to confirm the appointment of the complainant at the end of the probationary period on the grounds of failure to comply with the recognised procedure and infringement of the right to be heard, the Tribunal invited the Organisation to reopen the case, to enable the complainant to exercise his rights, and to consider whether he should be reinstated. At the same time it reserved the complainant's right to claim compensation whether or not he was reinstated. It further provided that the complainant could at the most only claim " compensation for the prejudice effectively suffered from the time of the coming into force of the decision complained of up until the date of notification of the decision to be taken, or eventually, if this day is sooner, until the day when his appointment would normally have ended ".

B. By letter of 15 October 1964 the Organisation offered to pay the complainant compensation, explaining the reasons for which it was considered inadvisable to reopen the case with a view to his possible reinstatement. The complainant having challenged the basis on which the compensation was assessed, maintaining that it was payable even if, as he desired, steps were taken with a view to his possible reinstatement, and without prejudice to additional compensation in the event of non-reinstatement, the Organisation on 3 December 1964 offered him the sum of United States $10,120.43, representing his salary for the period between the premature termination of his appointment and the date when his appointment would normally have ended, including allowances and benefits, plus interest at 4 per cent. for the period between 1 June 1963, date of the normal termination of his appointment, and 11 September 1964, date on which the above-mentioned judgment was delivered. It was also specified that this sum was offered in final settlement of all the complainants's rights, and that if he insisted on the reopening of hearings on his case the offer would be withdrawn and any compensation would be fixed thereafter in the light of the results of such hearings. No settlement having been reached, the complainant requested the intervention of the Tribunal, which laid down the procedure for consideration of the dispute.

C. In the final version of his conclusions, the complainant recognises that he has nothing to gain from a fresh investigation and confines himself to claiming, besides a satisfactory certificate of service, compensation comprising his salary, including allowances and benefits, for the period between the premature termination of his appointment and the date of its normal termination, plus one salary step to which he claimed that he would have been entitled if he had remained in the Organisation's service, interest at 4 per cent. on the amount thus computed from the normal date of expiry of his appointment to the date of payment of compensation, and additional compensation of United States $20,000 for damage to his health resulting from a nervous breakdown due to the illegal treatment he had received, entailing loss of earnings as well as suffering and expense. The Organisation opposes these claims and prays that payment of the sum offered by it on 3 December 1964 should be ratified as constituting full settlement of all its obligations under Judgment No. 69 of 11 September 1964.

CONSIDERATIONS

1. On the principle of compensation :

Both parties having agreed to the settlement of the complainant's claims by means of the payment of compensation, the Tribunal's task is confined to fixing the amount of such compensation. In any event, the complainant is entitled only to compensation for the injury actually caused to him by the rescinded decision.

2. On the salary step on which the compensation is computed :

The Organisation has offered the complainant compensation computed on the basis of grade P.4, step 1. The complainant, on the other hand, claims that as a result of the quashing of the decision to terminate his appointment he is deemed to have remained in the service of the Organisation until 31 May 1963, that in that event he would normally have received the salary applicable to grade P.4, step 2, from 31 May 1962 until 31 May 1963, and that he is therefore entitled to compensation computed on this basis for the period in question. However, once he has withdrawn his demand for a rehearing in regard to the circumstances of the termination of his appointment, the complainant can hardly claim that if he had remained in the Organisation's service until 31 May 1963 he would necessarily have received an increment on 31 May 1962. On the contrary, it is by no means improbable that at the latter date the Organisation would have extended the complainant's probationary period under article 440, paragraph 1 (b), of the Staff Regulations without increasing his salary. There are therefore no grounds for departing from the basis of compensation adopted by the Organisation.

3. On the claim for supplementary compensation of $20,000 :

In addition to a sum corresponding to his salary from 15 September 1962 to 31 May 1963, the complainant also claims a sum of $20,000 as additional compensation for the psychological disturbance which he claims to have suffered as a result of his dismissal. It is not inconceivable that an official might be so deeply affected by the termination of his appointment as to fall ill and to become incapacitated for work for a certain length of time. In the present case, however, the complainant could in any event have expected the termination of his appointment on 31 May 1963, and therefore, failing quite exceptional circumstances he has no grounds for maintaining that his dismissal led to the deterioration of his health and to incapacity for work after that date. The existence of any such circumstances cannot be deemed to be established by the evidence submitted by the complainant. In particular, they do not appear to be sufficiently established by the statements of the psychiatrist who attended the complainant since June 1963 and whose comments on the origin of the complainant's alleged illness are based on conjecture rather than on observed facts. It follows that in offering the complainant compensation equal to the salary to which he would have been entitled from 15 September 1962 to 31 May 1963, without any deduction on account of possible earnings during that period, the Organisation has taken full account of the injury caused to him by the loss of his employment. Moreover, under the strict terms of Judgment No. 69, the complainant would be entitled only to compensation for the injury suffered by him up to 31 May 1963, and therefore his claim for higher compensation should be rejected without further consideration on this ground alone.

4. On the date up to which interest is due :

There is agreement between the parties that the complainant is entitled to interest on the compensation awarded at 4 per cent. from 1 June 1963. They are not agreed, however, as to the date up to which interest is due. It follows from the considerations set out above that the Organisation's offer of 3 December 1964 was satisfactory as a whole. In the Tribunal's view, even if it was slightly inadequate in respect of interest it was liberal in respect of capital ; the complainant was therefore wrong to reject this offer and has accordingly no grounds for claiming supplementary compensation.

5. On the issue of a certificate :

The certificate issued to the complainant on 9 August 1965 deals with the nature and length of his service and with his abilities and conduct. It complies fully with the requirements of article 995 of the Staff Regulations and does not need to be supplemented, particularly as the complainant himself has not requested any amendment of it although it has been in his hands for nearly three months.

On these grounds,

DECISION

1. The Tribunal records the offer of the Organisation to pay the complainant a sum of United States $10,120.43 including interest, such payment constituting the full discharge of the obligations arising out of Judgment No. 69 dated 11 September 1964.

2. The complaint is dismissed.

In witness of this judgment, delivered in public sitting in Geneva on 6 November 1965 by Mr. Maxime Letourneur, President, Mr. André Grisel, Vice-President, and the Right Honourable Lord Devlin, P.C., Judge, the aforementioned have hereunto attached their signatures to these presents, as well as myself, Lemoine, Registrar of the Tribunal.

Text of the Judgment Given in the Case of: Barakat against International Labour Organisation

INTERNATIONAL LABOUR ORGANISATION

ADMINISTRATIVE TRIBUNAL

Fifteenth Ordinary Session (Geneva, 1-6 November 1965)

Registry's translation, the French text alone being authoritative.

In re Barakat — Judgment No. 89

The Administrative Tribunal,

Considering the complaint against the International Labour Organisation drawn up by Mr. Aziz Barakat on 19 February 1965, the Organisation's reply dated 30 March 1965, the complainant's rejoinder dated 29 June 1965, the Organisation's surrejoinder dated 10 September 1965, together with the complainant's rectifications dated 5 October 1965, and the Organisation's observations thereon, dated 26 October 1965;

Considering articles II, VII and VIII of the Statute of the Tribunal, and articles 1.2, 1.8, 11.2, 12.1, 12.2, 12.8, 12.9 and 13.1 of the Staff Regulations of the International Labour Office, together with Annex IV to the said Regulations;

Having examined the documents in the dossier, whereupon the oral proceedings and the hearing of witnesses prayed for by complainant and the hearing of witnesses requested by the Organisation in a subsidiary plea, were found without relevance to the disposition of the case and were therefore disallowed;

Considering that the material facts of the case are as follows:

A. The complainant having requested, on 8 September 1964, a waiver of his immunity from jurisdiction in order to institute judicial proceedings relating to the refusal to make available a substantial financial contribution which he considered to have been pledged for the purposes of a transaction of a commercial character, the investigation of his request led to an inquiry as a result of which the defendant Organisation felt satisfied that complainant was engaging in unauthorised outside activities which, moreover, were incompatible with his status as an international civil servant.

B. On 13 October 1964 the complainant was advised that the Director-General deemed that the outside occupations in the sense of article 1.2 of the Staff Regulations in which the complainant had engaged without permission, the fact that the complainant had made use of his position as an international official in Switzerland for purposes foreign to the reasons for his presence in the country, and the risk of public discredit that the size of his financial operations placed on the Organisation, constituted serious misconduct liable to the sanction of summary dismissal. However, before submitting to the Joint Committee a proposal for summary dismissal, in accordance with the prescribed procedure, the complainant would be allowed the option to resign within 48 hours, failing which disciplinary proceedings would be initiated. On 15 October 1964 the complainant submitted a resignation without conditions or restrictions, to take effect on 15 November 1964, which resignation was accepted forthwith.

C. On 13 November 1964 the complainant submitted a complaint under article 13.1 of the Staff Regulations, relating to the unfair and unjustifiable treatment to which he had been subjected when confronted with the choice between resignation and summary dismissal, which complaint he wished to be referred to the Joint Committee. On 24 November 1964 the complainant was advised that, in fact, he had been offered a choice between resignation and the initiation of disciplinary proceedings leading to the consideration of a proposal for summary dismissal by the Joint Committee, following whose opinion a final decision would have been taken, and that, in resigning, the complainant had himself forfeited the opportunity to have the case referred to the Joint Committee, so that his request had become without purpose. On 19 February 1965 the complainant lodged the aforementioned complaint with the Tribunal.

D. Before the Tribunal Mr. Barakat submits that the financial operations he had engaged in and, in particular, that for the purpose of which he had requested a waiver of immunity, were aimed at investing his private estate, the management of which could not be regarded as an outside activity, all the more so as these investments, which he alleges were known to high officials, would have given rise to no adverse comments on their part; he further submits that, as the operations he engaged in were in no way contrary to law and involved no financial risks that were not secured by real property collaterals, these operations involved no risk of throwing the Organisation into public discredit and were not incompatible with his status as an international civil servant. In the circumstances, the decisions of 13 October and 24 November 1964, which in his view resulted in obtaining his resignation under duress, and to depriving him of the opportunity to rebut the charges preferred against him, were illegitimate and arbitrary and should be held to be so by the Tribunal, which, according to the complainant's last submission, should quash them, in so far as appropriate, and prays for the award of an indemnity for the prejudice suffered as a consequence of these decisions.

E. The defendant Organisation first challenges, in limine litis, the competence of the Tribunal to entertain the complaint, on the ground that, in objecting to the alternative between resignation and the initiation of disciplinary proceedings which was offered to him, the complainant fails to advance any violation of his terms of appointment or any relevant regulation, while the Tribunal is competent only to pass upon such violations, and that the complainant fails to indicate any genuine relationship between the complaint and the statutory provisions invoked. Subsidiarily, the defendant Organisation submits that the complaint is not receivable under four heads: firstly, the lack of any administrative decision adversely affecting the complainant, since neither the initiation of disciplinary proceedings, nor a resignation—separately or taken together—were such as to cause in themselves any damage; secondly, the tardy submission of the complaint which was lodged after the expiry of the time limit for recourse to the Tribunal, which should run from 13 October 1964; thirdly, the financial nature of the prayer for relief, since where it finds a complaint to be well founded the Tribunal is to order the quashing of the decision complained of or the performance of the obligation relied upon; and fourthly, the lack of definition of the points at issue, in so far as the complaint treats as one two separate decisions taken on different dates. More subsidiarily, the defendant Organisation submits that the complaint should be dismissed as not well founded, in that the option offered to the complainant was legitimate. Even more subsidiarily, should the Tribunal wish to review possible errors in fact or in law in respect of the charges made against Mr. Barakat, the defendant Organisation prays for the previous consideration of further evidence.

CONSIDERATIONS

1. On the competence of the Tribunal:

Under article II, paragraph 1, of its Statute, the Tribunal is competent to hear complaints alleging non-observance, in substance or in form, of the terms of appointment of officials of the International Labour Office, and of such provisions of the Staff Regulations as are applicable to the case. In the present case the complainant has not confined himself to alleging infringement of articles 1.2 and 12.1 of the Staff Regulations, but has also complained that undue influence was brought to bear upon him to secure his resignation, thus implying infringement by the Director-General of a general rule of law which is equally applicable to the international civil service. On this reasoning, the present complaint is among those that the Tribunal is competent to hear.

It being unnecessary to consider the administration's submission to the effect that the complaint is not receivable:

2. On the merits:

It appears from the documents in the dossier that the allegations against Mr. Barakat were of such a nature as to justify initiating disciplinary proceedings. The Director-General was therefore entitled to institute these proceedings. Consequently, in offering Mr. Barakat the choice between voluntary resignation and appearing before the Joint Committee, the Director-General, far from bringing any kind of pressure to bear, was simply offering him a solution which he was in no way obliged to offer.

Moreover, it was open to Mr. Barakat in the course of the proceedings, if he so desired, to defend himself against the charges preferred against him. The choice that lay before him was therefore entirely free. Furthermore, in the circumstances, the time allowed to the complainant to choose between the alternatives put before him was not unduly short, having regard to the fact that the complainant was a man of experience and that, if he had thought it necessary to reflect further or to take legal advice, it was open to him to ask for an extension of the time limit, which he did not do. It follows that the complainant's appointment was terminated as a result of his own resignation, freely tendered, and that his complaint is therefore not well-founded and must be dismissed.

On these grounds,

DECISION

The complaint is dismissed.

In witness of this judgment, delivered in public sitting in Geneva on 6 November 1965 by Mr. Maxime Letourneur, President, Mr. André Grisel, Vice-President, and the Right Honourable Lord Devlin, P.C., Judge, the aforementioned have hereunto subscribed their signatures, as well as myself, Lemoine, Registrar of the Tribunal.

Text of the Judgment Given in the Case of: Prasad against Food and Agriculture Organisation of the United Nations

INTERNATIONAL LABOUR ORGANISATION

ADMINISTRATIVE TRIBUNAL

Fifteenth Ordinary Session (Geneva, 1-6 November 1965)

In re Prasad — Judgment No. 90

The Administrative Tribunal,

Considering the complaint against the Food and Agriculture Organisation of the United Nations drawn up by Mr. Ram Prasad on 12 June 1965, and the Organisation's reply of 4 August 1965;

Considering articles II and VIII of the Statute of the Tribunal and article 301.091 of the Staff Regulations of F.A.O., and section 314.221 of its Administrative Manual;

Having examined the documents in the dossier, oral proceedings having neither been requested by the parties nor ordered by the Tribunal;

Considering that the material facts of the case are as follows:

A. The complainant was appointed as staff member of F.A.O. on 14 November 1951 as a porter at the G.1 grade, serving in the New Delhi Office. The complainant's appointment was converted into a permanent appointment effective on 1 May 1961. On 1 January 1963 his post was reclassified from porter at G.1 grade to driver-messenger at the G.2 grade. For the purposes of his duties as driver-messenger he used a motor scooter belonging to the Organisation.

B. On 7 January 1963 the complainant was given a cheque for 1,000 rupees to draw cash from the bank. He gave the money to Mr. Singh, the administrative assistant, who on checking it found that there were 99 ten-rupee notes. The complainant immediately put his hand in his pocket and found another ten-rupee note which he gave to Mr. Singh. Mr. Singh alleged that this sort of thing had happened on several occasions previously and that the complainant had explained it by saying that he distributed the cash in all his pockets to avoid losing the full sum if robbed. Following upon this incident Mr. Hachiya, the administrative officer, gave the complainant a written reprimand in which he said: "In future, whenever you are deputed for cash drawings you should be very cautious in many matters and always count the cash before giving it to anybody."

C. On 29 January 1963 Mr. Hachiya gave the complainant a written reprimand for using the office address for his private affairs, saying: "You are therefore immediately instructed to take suitable steps to correct your private address as soon as possible."

D. On 2 August 1963 the complainant, while driving the Office scooter along the Lodhi road in Delhi, collided with a cyclist coming out of a side lane. The complainant sustained minor injuries and was on sick leave for a fortnight. Since the cyclist also sustained only minor injuries, the matter was amicably settled. It is alleged by the Organisation that the police report (which has not been produced) placed the principal blame for the accident on the complainant because of excessive speed. No criminal prosecution was, however, brought against him. On being questioned by Mr. Hachiya, the complainant admitted that on an earlier occasion, the date of which is not stated, he had been fined for a minor traffic infringement. Mr. Hachiya gave the complainant a written reprimand, reminding him to drive the scooter very carefully and not to over-speed.

E. On 30 September 1963 a dispute arose between the complainant and Mr. Singh as to whether the complainant had been paid his September salary. Mr. Singh asserted that he had been paid on 27 September and the complainant denied it. Mr. Hachiya, feeling that the dishonesty was on the part of the complainant, instructed him not to come to the Office after 2 October until further notice. The complainant asked the Acting Deputy Regional Representative in Delhi, Mr. Cedric Day, for an investigation.

F. On 18 October 1963 Mr. Hachiya wrote to the Director of Personnel and Management of F.A.O. in Rome recounting the incidents set out above and saying he wished to dismiss the complainant " since his daily interference in many matters is creating a bad impression on the other local staff members ". He added that he had carefully watched the complainant's job during the last 11 months and found that it was not satisfactory. Consequently, the complainant was informed that " as several facts indicative of misconduct have come to the attention of the Organisation " he was formally suspended from 25 October 1963 pending investigation.

G. Meanwhile, on 1 October 1963, the day when the complainant was first suspended for suspected dishonesty, he drove a motor scooter down a one-way street in the wrong direction. His excuse was that he had not observed it to be a one-way street. The Organisation was unaware of this offence until 4 November 1963 when it received a police notice. It does not appear that the complainant was prosecuted.

H. Mr. Day was unable in his investigation to reach a firm conclusion on the dispute about payment of salary and, in fact, the complainant was paid the amount ex gratia. Mr. Day dealt in detail with the incidents recounted above and also with the general charge of unsatisfactory conduct. Under this head, he reported that the complainant's behaviour and attitude during the last three years had gradually deteriorated and that it was necessary for his supervisors to reprimand him for lack of attention to duty, disobedience, argumentativeness and insolence. He reported that the complainant had been surly and aggressive in his attitude towards senior members of the local staff and that, despite repeated warnings, he had been guilty of such behaviour as late appearance on duty, early departure from the office, failure to return from delivery missions, overstaying annual leave and taking unreasonably long breaks during office hours.

The Tribunal has observed that no statements have been furnished by persons complaining of the complainant's misbehaviour in these respects, that no specific incidents are detailed and that no written reprimands on this subject were addressed to the complainant. It appears that the practice of issuing written reprimands was not introduced into the Delhi Office until 1963.

I. The complainant strongly denies any misbehaviour of the sort described in the preceding paragraph. He relies on the fact that the evaluations of his service, the last of which was dated 13 March 1962, have never been unfavourable. He relies on the fact that on 1 January 1963 he was upgraded from G.1 to G.2. The Organisation has pointed out that the upgrading occurred because the post which the complainant held was reclassified from porter at the G.1 grade to driver-messenger at the G.2 grade; and it states that at the time of the reclassification it was decided to retain the complainant in the post he was occupying rather than to transfer him to another post since he was the oldest and most senior eligible staff member.

J. On 6 April 1964 the Deputy Regional Representative notified the complainant that he had decided that the complainant's appointment should be terminated, effective immediately, on the grounds of unsatisfactory performance of duty. He said: " In coming to this decision I have in mind especially the occasions of unsatisfactory service which have been brought to your attention such as careless handling of cash entrusted to you, careless driving, your accident record, and your general attitude of non-co-operation with your supervisors and colleagues, all of which had made your job performance below the acceptable level."

K. By letter of 18 April 1964 the complainant requested the Director-General to reconsider the decision to terminate the complainant's appointment and, on 18 May 1964, the Director-General informed the complainant that he maintained his decision. The complainant thereupon submitted an appeal to the F.A.O. Appeals Committee, which heard the case on 19 November 1964 and submitted its recommendation in the following terms: " After due consideration of this appeal in all its aspects, the Committee strongly recommends that the Director-General reconsider his decision of termination." The Director-General felt that he could not follow the recommendation of the Appeals Committee but, by letter of 18 March 1965, which reached the complainant on 5 April 1965, the Director-General informed the complainant that, while maintaining his decision to terminate his appointment, he was prepared to convert the termination for unsatisfactory service into a termination in the interest of the good administration of the Organisation, with consequent increase in the termination indemnities payable to the complainant. Under Staff Regulation 301.091 such action can be taken provided it is not contested by the staff member concerned. The complainant declined this offer and instituted proceedings before the Tribunal, praying for the quashing of the decision to terminate his appointment and for reinstatement. The Organisation prays the Tribunal to find that the Director-General's decision to terminate the complainant for unsatisfactory service was in conformity with the applicable Staff Regulations, Staff Rules and the Administrative Manual, and to dismiss the complaint.

CONSIDERATIONS

1. Staff Regulation 301.091 provides that the Director-General may terminate an appointment of a staff member who holds a permanent appointment if the services of the individual concerned prove unsatisfactory. Staff Manual provision 314.221, relating to termination for unsatisfactory service, lays down that a staff member may be separated following written warning for failure to perform prescribed duties in a satisfactory manner (e.g. because of lack of fitness, aptitude or suitability for the post).

2. For the purpose of fulfilling the requirements in Staff Manual provision 314.221 that there must be a written warning of failure to perform prescribed duties, the Organisation relies upon the three reprimands referred to in paragraphs B, C and D of the summary of facts.

As to the first, it is not alleged that after the receipt of the reprimand there was any further cause for complaint about the careless handling of cash. As to the second, the reprimand related to an incident that is not relied upon as evidence of unsatisfactory service, and furthermore it is not alleged that the instruction contained in it was disregarded.

The only reprimand therefore that it is relevant to consider is the reprimand for over-speeding which was followed by the careless entry into the one-way street.

3. The Tribunal notes that none of the specific incidents recounted above is relied on as of itself sufficient to justify the termination of the complainant's employment. They are presented as evidence of unsatisfactory service. It is unnecessary for the Tribunal to consider whether, taken together and viewed against the background of 12 years' service, they amount to sufficient evidence; or whether the general charge of unco-operative conduct is sufficiently proved; or to what extent the Tribunal should, in a case of this sort, review a decision of the Director-General.

4. The Tribunal can dispose of the case on the ground that there was no written warning as required by the terms of Staff Manual provision 314.221 and as indeed is necessary to protect the employee from sudden dismissal on a general charge. A warning is different from a reprimand. It is not enough that the employer should be able to point to several occasions in the course of a long service when a rebuke has been administered. What is contemplated by the provision is that the employee should be told in what respects his service as a whole has proved unsatisfactory and warned that if he does not give better service he faces the possibility of dismissal. A reminder to drive more carefully and not to over-speed is not a warning the disregard of which is sufficient to justify a dismissal for unsatisfactory service.

DECISION

For the above reasons,

The decision of 18 March 1965 to terminate the complainant's appointment for unsatisfactory service is quashed.

In witness of this judgment, delivered in public sitting in Geneva on 6 November 1965 by Mr. Maxime Letourneur, President, Mr. André Grisel, Vice-President, and the Right Honourable Lord Devlin, P.C., Judge, the aforementioned have hereunto attached their signatures to these presents, as well as myself, Lemoine, Registrar of the Tribunal.

APPROVAL OF THE MINUTES OF THE 163RD SESSION

Subject to the insertion of the corrections received, the Governing Body approved the minutes of the 163rd Session.

REPORT OF THE MEETING OF EXPERTS ON RESPIRATORY FUNCTION TESTS IN PNEUMOCONIOSES

(Geneva, 20-28 September 1965)

The Governing Body had before it the report of the Meeting of Experts on Respiratory Function Tests in Pneumoconioses (Geneva, 20-28 September 1965).[1]

The Governing Body—

(a) took note of the report and authorised its widest possible distribution;

(b) authorised the Director-General to communicate the report to governments with the request that they transmit it to the bodies and services concerned; and

(c) requested the Director-General to take account of the recommendations made by the Meeting of Experts when drawing up the work programme of the Office for future years.[2]

REPORT OF THE MEETING OF CONSULTANTS ON WOMEN WORKERS' PROBLEMS

(Geneva, 20-28 September 1965)

The Governing Body also had before it the report of the Meeting of Consultants on Women Workers' Problems (Geneva, 20-28 September 1965).[3] It took note of the report and requested the Director-General to take the views and suggestions of the consultants into account in planning and orienting the work of the Office and in formulating future programme proposals for the consideration of the Governing Body.

It further requested the Director-General to transmit the report, together with an account of the Governing Body's discussion, to the governments of member States and, through them, to employers' and workers' organisations and to the United Nations Commission on the Status of Women.

Report of the Permanent Agricultural Committee

(Seventh Session, Geneva, 22 November-3 December 1965)

The Permanent Agricultural Committee held its Seventh Session in Geneva from 22 November to 3 December 1965.[1]

The Governing Body—

(a) took note of the report and conclusions adopted by the Permanent Agricultural Committee at its Seventh Session;

(b) authorised the Director-General to communicate the report and conclusions of the Committee to the governments of member States; and

(c) authorised the Director-General to communicate the report and conclusions of the Committee to the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development and the Food and Agriculture Organisation of the United Nations—drawing their special attention to the Committee's recommendations as set forth in the conclusions concerning the stabilisation of the prices of agricultural products and the World Food Programme[2]—and to the other international organisations and bodies concerned.

Report of the Working Group on the Revision of the International Standard Classification of Occupations (I.S.C.O.)

(Geneva, 6-17 December 1965)

The Governing Body took note of the report of the Working Group on the Revision of the International Standard Classification of Occupations (I.S.C.O.).[3]

Record of the Preparatory Technical Conference on the Maximum Permissible Weight to Be Carried by One Worker

(Geneva, 25 January-4 February 1966)

When it examined, at its 163rd Session, the agenda of the 51st Session of the International Labour Conference (1967), the Governing Body decided that the sixth item on this agenda should be " Maximum permissible weight to be carried by one worker ", its exact scope to be decided by the Governing Body in the light of the conclusions of the Preparatory Technical Conference on the Maximum Permissible Weight to Be Carried by One Worker.[4] This conference was held in Geneva from 25 January to 4 February 1966.[5]

The Governing Body at its 164th Session adopted the following wording for the item, which it had placed on the agenda of the 51st (1967) Session of the International Labour Conference as item VI for single discussion:

Maximum permissible weight to be carried by one worker.

It decided that the report of the Preparatory Technical Conference on the Maximum Permissible Weight to Be Carried by One Worker and the text of the conclusions adopted by the Conference should be communicated to member States with a questionnaire, in accordance with the procedure provided for in article 38, paragraphs 1 and 4 (a), of the Standing Orders of the Conference.

Report of the Working Party on the Programme and Structure of the I.L.O.

The Working Party on the Programme and Structure of the I.L.O., which was appointed following a decision by the Governing Body at its 160th Session (November 1964) [1], held its Fourth Session on 8-11 February, 28 February and 1 March 1966. It adopted its Fourth Report on the role, composition and procedures of Industrial Committees and analogous bodies and of the regional conferences and regional advisory committees. It postponed its examination of the same questions as they related to the General Conference, the Governing Body and their committees.

The Governing Body—

(a) approved the conclusions of the Working Party's Fourth Report;

(b) decided to communicate the relevant parts of the report, together with the record of the views expressed on these matters in the course of the Working Party's proceedings, as recommended by the Working Party in its report, to the Committee on Industrial Committees;

(c) decided to communicate the report, as the Third Report of the Working Party, to the International Labour Conference at its 50th Session for discussion in connection with the Report of the Director-General (Part II);

(d) instructed the Director-General to make available to the Conference, as an annex to the report of the Working Party, a summary of communications received from governments and employers' and workers' organisations in respect of the proposals concerning the role, composition and procedures of Industrial Committees and analogous bodies, and the role, composition and procedures of the regional conferences and regional advisory committees.

Reports of the Committee on Freedom of Association

At its second sitting the Governing Body examined the reports of its Committee on Freedom of Association.

Eighty-sixth Report [2]

The Governing Body had before it the 86th Report of its Committee on Freedom of Association and adopted the recommendations contained therein.

Eighty-seventh Report [2]

The Governing Body also had before it the 87th Report of the Committee on Freedom of Association. It adopted the recommendations contained therein and, after a discussion on the case concerning Brazil, it also, on a proposal by the Workers' Vice-Chairman of the Governing Body, requested the Director-General to convey to the Brazilian Government the Governing Body's deep concern and to press for a speedy reply by the Government to the questions put by the Committee on Freedom of Association.

Eighty-eighth Report [2]

The Governing Body also had before it the Committee's 88th Report. There was a discussion on the case involving Burundi, following which the Governing Body adopted the recommendation made in the report and also, on a proposal by the Workers' Vice-Chairman, asked that any press release to be published by the I.L.O. should have regard to its debate on these cases and requested the Director-General to transmit the minutes of the discussion to the Government of Burundi and the Economic and Social Council at the same time as the 88th Report of the Committee on Freedom of Association.

[1] See Official Bulletin, Vol. XLVIII, No. 1 Jan. 1965, pp. 11-12.

Eighty-ninth Report

The Governing Body decided to examine the 89th Report of the Committee on Freedom of Association at its 165th Session.

REPORTS OF THE FINANCIAL AND ADMINISTRATIVE COMMITTEE

On the recommendation of its Financial and Administrative Committee the Governing Body decided to recommend the International Labour Conference to approve a net budget of United States $22,472,398 for the 49th financial period (1967).

The Governing Body approved a number of transfers within the 1965 budget. It accepted contributions and donations to the Endowment Fund of the International Institute for Labour Studies from governments and private sources; it also approved the budget estimates for the Institute for 1967 and included a fixed subsidy to the Institute within the I.L.O. budget.

After discussing the financing of meetings and other projects for which no allocation had been made in the 1966 budget the Governing Body decided that the cost of providing Arabic interpretation at the plenary sittings of the International Labour Conference in 1966 should be charged to item 25 (unforeseen expenditure) of the budget for that year. It was understood that the Director-General would bring the Governing Body's decision to the attention of the Administrative Committee on Co-ordination, pointing out the considerations on which it was based and suggesting that A.C.C. should consider its general approach to this problem. It was further understood that the Director-General would communicate A.C.C.'s position on this matter to the Financial and Administrative Committee and the Governing Body for consideration in connection with their examination of the possible provision of Arabic interpretation by the I.L.O. in future years.

The Governing Body took note of the statement of arrears of contributions as at 31 January 1966 and, on the basis of the report of the Working Party on the Working Capital Fund, requested the Director-General to express on its behalf to the governments of all member States serious concern at the continued failure of many governments to pay their annual contributions to the budget of the Organisation by the date on which they are due, i.e. by 1 January of the year to which the contributions relate, to request them to take all necessary steps to effect such payment promptly in future, and to report back to the Governing Body on the outcome; it also requested the employers' and workers' organisations in all member States to impress on governments the importance of promptly paying, or continuing to pay, their contributions to the I.L.O. budget.

The Governing Body also took note of various information in the Committee's reports on financial, administrative and personnel questions. It approved a number of amendments to the Staff Regulations and took note of a number of proposals concerning pensions.

On the recommendation of its Building Subcommittee the Governing Body took note of the sections of the report dealing with the agreement with the Property Foundation for International Organisations concerning the proposed new headquarters building[1] and the appointment of a team of three architects. It also approved the composition of the Advisory Committee of Architects set up to advise the Director-General on the over-all plans for the proposed new headquarters building. The Governing Body endorsed the Director-General's request to the team of architects to continue the study of over-all plans for the new headquarters building, based on the assumption that over the period of 15 years ahead the headquarters staff might increase by one-third, one-half or two-thirds of the number of staff employed in Geneva in 1966.

The Governing Body decided to submit to the International Labour Conference a resolution extending for a further period of three years the term of office of Mr. André GRISEL (Switzerland) as a Judge of the Administrative Tribunal of the International Labour Organisation.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON STANDING ORDERS AND THE APPLICATION OF CONVENTIONS AND RECOMMENDATIONS

The Governing Body had before it the report of the Committee on Standing Orders and the Application of Conventions and Recommendations, on the basis of which it took the following decisions:

Application of Conventions and Recommendations

Choice of Conventions and Recommendations on Which Reports under Article 19 of the Constitution Are to Be Requested for 1967 and 1968.

The Governing Body requested governments to supply reports under article 19 of the Constitution on the following instruments:

In 1967:

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29).

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105).

The reports on these Conventions would be requested on the basis of the report forms approved in 1960.

In 1968:

Protection of Workers' Health Recommendation, 1953 (No. 97).
Welfare Facilities Recommendation, 1956 (No. 102).
Occupational Health Services Recommendation, 1959 (No. 112).
Workers' Housing Recommendation, 1961 (No. 115).

Special Report by the Governing Body concerning the Application of Article 3, Paragraph 3 (b), of the Radiation Protection Convention, 1960 (No. 115).

The Governing Body approved the draft report on this subject and authorised its submission to the International Labour Conference at its 50th Session. It requested the Director-General to draw the attention of all the member States which had not yet ratified Convention No. 115 to the importance of its widespread ratification and application.

Standing Orders

Procedure in Regional Conferences.

The Governing Body decided to submit to the International Labour Conference, for adoption with a view to their inclusion in the Rules concerning the Powers,

Report of the International Organisations Committee

Industrial Development

A long discussion took place on the section of the report dealing with industrial development and the establishment of a United Nations Organisation for Industrial Development.

At the conclusion of its discussions the Governing Body took note of the action taken by the General Assembly for the establishment of a United Nations Organisation for Industrial Development and welcomed the intensification of activities to promote the industrialisation of developing countries, to which that organisation should make an important contribution.

The Governing Body decided to favour the development of close co-operation between the I.L.O. and the United Nations Organisation for Industrial Development and the establishment of suitable arrangements to ensure the fullest use of I.L.O. facilities and experience and the avoidance of wasteful duplication of activities between the two organisations. It decided to devote special attention to ways and means of enabling the I.L.O. further to develop the scope and effectiveness of the contribution it is making in its own fields of competence to the industrialisation of developing countries and invited the Director-General to pursue his efforts to establish and maintain close and effective liaison with the United Nations, and in particular the United Nations Organisation for Industrial Development and other organisations concerned, to promote the achievement of the objectives just mentioned.

The Governing Body requested the Director-General to transmit the record of its discussion to the Secretary-General of the United Nations, the Commissioner for Industrial Development, the Administrator of the United Nations Development Programme and all other interested parties in the United Nations.

Twentieth Session of the General Assembly

The Governing Body took note of the part of the report dealing with measures taken by the General Assembly at its 20th Session (New York, 21 September-21 December 1965).

Fifth Session of the Joint I.L.O.-W.H.O. Committee on Occupational Health

The Governing Body approved the convening of the Fifth Session of the Joint I.L.O.-W.H.O. Committee on Occupational Health during the second half of 1966, at a date to be determined in agreement with the World Health Organisation, to consider the following agenda:

I. Review of existing resources in the field of protection of workers' health in the developing countries.

II. Consideration of the basic needs and special problems of the developing countries in the field of occupational health.

III. Characteristics and functions of occupational health services in these countries.

IV. Practical guidance with respect to the organisation of such services, with special reference to the role of paramedical and auxiliary personnel.

The Governing Body decided that the I.L.O. should invite to the meeting experts from Cameroon, France, Guatemala, India, Nigeria and the United Kingdom, one of whom should be nominated in agreement with the Employers' group and one in agreement with the Workers' group, and noted that the Director-General would submit to it at a later session the names of the six experts to be invited by the I.L.O. It authorised the Director-General to invite the Permanent Commission and International Association on Occupational Health to send an observer to the meeting.

Report of the Committee on Industrial Committees

Tripartite Technical Meeting on Hotels, Restaurants and Similar Establishments: Effect to Be Given to the Conclusions of the Meeting

The Governing Body authorised the Director-General to communicate the reports, conclusions and resolutions adopted by the Tripartite Technical Meeting on Hotels, Restaurants and Similar Establishments [1] to governments, drawing their special attention to the reports and conclusions Nos. 1 and 2 [2], informing them that the Governing Body had not expressed any opinion on the contents thereof and inviting them to transmit these documents to the employers' and workers' organisations concerned.

At its 163rd Session the Governing Body decided to include an item on technical co-operation in the agenda of the 51st (1967) Session of the International Labour Conference, it being understood that the Director-General would submit suggestions on this point early in 1966 in the light of the discussion due to take place in the Committee on Operational Programmes.[1]

At the 164th Session the Governing Body decided that the wording of the item on technical co-operation, which would be item VIII on the agenda of the 51st Session of the Conference, should be as follows: " The International Labour Organisation and technical co-operation ".

The Governing Body took a number of other decisions dealing with the report on the subject which will be submitted to the Conference and asked the Director-General to indicate in the memorandum on the 51st Session of the Conference to be addressed to member States that the Governing Body had recommended that the item should be considered by a special Conference committee and that it would be desirable to include in the delegations to this session of the Conference officials who were called upon to deal with technical co-operation questions concerning the I.L.O. and representatives of employers' and workers' organisations who were familiar with these questions.

Report by the Director-General concerning Action on the Resolution concerning Southern Rhodesia Adopted by the Governing Body at Its 163rd Session (November 1965) [2]

The Governing Body requested the Director-General to draw the attention of the Government of the United Kingdom to the desirability of making provision in the settlement of the Rhodesian problem to ensure respect for the fundamental human rights embodied in I.L.O. standards, including in particular—

(a) the full implementation of the obligations accepted on behalf of Southern Rhodesia under the Forced Labour Convention, 1930, and the Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957, and more especially the elimination of forced or compulsory labour imposed as a means of political coercion or as a punishment for holding or expressing political or ideological views;

[2] For details of this resolution see ibid., pp. 27-28.

(b) the full and free enjoyment by employers and workers of the right to associate, to organise and to bargain collectively with due regard to the obligations in the matter already accepted on behalf of Southern Rhodesia and to the provisions of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948, and the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949;

(c) the abolition of all forms of racial discrimination in the field of employment and occupation with due regard to the obligations accepted on behalf of Southern Rhodesia under the Social Policy (Non-Metropolitan Territories) Convention, 1947, and to the provisions of the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958.

The Governing Body placed it on record that the I.L.O. would welcome the resumption of active participation by Southern Rhodesia in the work of the Organisation as soon as a constitutional government pledged to the elimination of racial discrimination and to the upholding of other basic human rights and freedoms as embodied in I.L.O. standards had been established there.

The Governing Body further placed it on record that, as soon as a constitutional government pledged to the elimination of racial discrimination and to the upholding of other basic human rights and freedoms as embodied in I.L.O. standards had been established in Southern Rhodesia, the I.L.O. would be prepared to give every assistance within its power in the training of Rhodesians of all races for the assumption of responsibilities in administration, industry and industrial relations, more particularly through the facilities of the International Institute for Labour Studies and the International Centre for Advanced Technical and Vocational Training and all other appropriate facilities which were or might be operated by the I.L.O. under the United Nations Development Programme.

The Governing Body asked the Director-General to report further developments in the situation as might be appropriate.

Procedure for the Appointment of Committees by the Conference

The Governing Body appointed the following three persons to serve as the Appeals Board for the 50th (1966) Session of the Conference:

Mr. J. A. BARBOZA-CARNEIRO (Brazil).

Mr. H. H. KOCH (Denmark).

Mr. M. K. VELLODI (India).

The Director-General was authorised, in the event of any of the above-mentioned persons being unable to serve, to convene other members of the panel from which the Appeals Board is selected, as necessary, to ensure that the Appeals Board was duly constituted.[1]

Cancellation of the Registration of the Ratification by New Zealand of the Reduction of Hours of Work (Textiles) Convention, 1937 (No. 61)

The Governing Body took note of the action which the Director-General proposed to take with regard to the request by the Government of New Zealand that the registration of its ratification of the Reduction of Hours of Work (Textiles) Convention, 1937 (No. 61), should be cancelled.

Draft Recommendation concerning the Status of Teachers.

The Governing Body approved the following procedure for the I.L.O.-U.N.E.S.C.O. Intergovernmental Conference on the Status of Teachers to be held in the autumn of 1966 [1]:

(a) the Intergovernmental Conference should be convened by U.N.E.S.C.O. and should be held under its auspices;

(b) the I.L.O. should be represented at the Conference by a tripartite delegation of the Governing Body (composed of two representatives of each group, to be appointed later), the composition of which would reflect the I.L.O.'s keen interest in the question, and by the Director-General himself accompanied by officials of the technical service concerned. The Governing Body delegation would be entitled to participate fully in the deliberations of the Intergovernmental Conference and would be particularly careful to see that the provisions that related to primarily I.L.O. areas of activity appropriately reflected the views of the Organisation;

(c) the final decision on the action to be taken on the text emerging from the Intergovernmental Conference would be taken in the case of the I.L.O. by the Governing Body.

Requests by Non-Governmental International Organisations to Be Represented by Observers at the 50th (1966) Session of the International Labour Conference

The Governing Body invited the following organisations to be represented by observers at the 50th (1966) Session of the International Labour Conference, it being understood that it would be for the Selection Committee of the Conference to consider their requests to participate in the work of the committees dealing with the items on the agenda in which they had expressed an interest:

International Confederation of Executive Staffs.
International Council of Commerce Employers.
International Transport Workers' Confederation.
Organisation of Employers' Federations and Employers in Developing Countries.
Public Services International.
World Young Women's Christian Association.

Request for Regional Consultative Status.

The Governing Body decided to grant regional consultative status [2] in respect of the American region to the Inter-American Regional Organisation of Workers (O.R.I.T.) of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions.

Admission to the I.L.O. Special List of Non-Governmental International Organisations.

The Governing Body took note of the fact that the Officers considered that it was no longer necessary for them to review applications for admission to the I.L.O. special list of non-governmental international organisations and that it would suffice in future for the Director-General to deal with applications of this kind, it being understood that he would carry out periodic revisions of the list and report to the Governing Body from time to time on the over-all position with regard thereto.

DEPARTURE OF MR. E. BELL

The Governing Body was informed that Mr. E. Bell, Chief of the Workers' Relations Branch, who for the past ten years had handled matters affecting the Workers' group of the Governing Body, would shortly be leaving the Office. The Governing Body, through speakers of the three groups, paid tribute to the services rendered by Mr. Bell and conveyed to him its gratitude and best wishes.

Metal Trades Committee

(Eighth Session, Geneva, 6-17 December 1965)

The Eighth Session [1] of the Metal Trades Committee of the International Labour Organisation was held at the International Labour Office, Geneva, from 6 to 17 December 1965.

The agenda of the session, which had been fixed by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office at its 157th and 159th Sessions (November 1963 and June-July 1964), was as follows:

I. General Report, dealing particularly with—

(a) action taken in the various countries in the light of the conclusions adopted at previous sessions of the Committee;

(b) steps taken by the Office to follow up the studies and inquiries proposed by the Committee;

(c) recent events and developments in the metal trades.

II. International co-operation in dealing with manpower, social and labour problems in the metal trades in the developing countries.

III. The role of employers' and workers' organisations in programming and planning in the metal trades.

The International Labour Office had prepared a report on each of the above items.

In accordance with the decision of the Governing Body the Chairman of the Eighth Session was Mr. W. CLAUSSEN, representative of the Government of the Federal Republic of Germany on the Governing Body.

The Committee elected two Vice-Chairmen: Mr. M. BOURSIER (France) for the Employers' group and Mr. L. ECKERSTRÖM (Sweden) for the Workers' group.

The following 27 countries which are members of the Metal Trades Committee were represented at the Eighth Session:

Argentina.	France.	Peru.
Australia.	Federal Republic of Germany.	Sweden.
Austria.	India.	Switzerland.
Belgium.	Israel.	Ukraine.
Brazil.	Italy.	U.S.S.R.
Canada.	Japan.	United Kingdom.
Chile.	Mexico.	United States.
Denmark.	Netherlands.	Uruguay.
Finland.	Norway.	Yugoslavia.

In addition, Spain was represented at the meeting by an observer delegation.

The Governing Body was represented by the following delegation:

Government group : Mr. W. CLAUSSEN (Federal Republic of Germany).

Employers' group : Mr. A. G. FENNEMA (Netherlands).

Workers' group : Mr. R. FAUPL (United States).

During the meeting Mr. Faupl was replaced by Mr. H. BEERMANN (Federal Republic of Germany).

Representatives of the United Nations (Economic Commission for Europe, United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, and United Nations Centre for Industrial Development), the Organisation of American States, the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development and the League of Arab States attended the session.

In addition, observers from the following non-governmental international organisations were present at the session: International Confederation of Executive Staffs; International Confederation of Free Trade Unions [1]; International Federation of Christian Metalworkers' Unions; International Federation of Christian Trade Unions [1]; International Federation of Commercial, Clerical and Technical Employees; International Metalworkers' Federation; International Organisation of Employers [1]; and World Federation of Trade Unions.[1]

The Committee was divided into two subcommittees for the examination of the two technical items on its agenda: a Subcommittee on International Co-operation and a Subcommittee on Programming and Planning. The Committee also set up a Steering Committee and a Working Party to Consider the Effect Given to the Conclusions and Resolutions Adopted by the Metal Trades Committee at Its Previous Sessions.

The Committee held eight plenary sittings, of which six were devoted mainly to a general discussion of the problems before the session. At its seventh and eighth sittings the Committee adopted the reports and conclusions submitted by its two Subcommittees, together with six resolutions.[2]

Preparatory Technical Conference on the Maximum Permissible Weight to Be Carried by One Worker

(Geneva, 25 January-4 February 1966)

In accordance with the decision of the Governing Body taken at its 162nd Session (May-June 1965) the Preparatory Technical Conference on the Maximum Permissible Weight to Be Carried by One Worker met in Geneva from 25 January to 4 February 1966.

Twenty-nine countries were represented by 110 delegates; four countries were represented by observers. Four intergovernmental organisations accepted the invitation to participate in the Conference, and six international non-governmental organisations sent observers.

The Conference appointed a Steering Committee, two ad hoc working parties to deal respectively with the Proposed Conclusions with a view to the adoption of a Convention and the Proposed Conclusions with a view to the adoption of a Recommendation, and a Drafting Committee.

The Conference adopted Proposed Conclusions with a view to the adoption of a Convention and Proposed Conclusions with a view to the adoption of a Recommendation.

The " Documents " section of this issue contains the text of the two sets of Proposed Conclusions and a summary of the discussions leading to their adoption.[1]

Membership of the International Labour Organisation

Communication from the Government of the Republic of South Africa

The Director-General received the following communication dated 11 March 1964 from the Government of the Republic of South Africa:

London, 11 March 1964.

Sir,

I have been instructed by the Minister of Foreign Affairs of the Republic of South Africa to convey to you the following statement from him on behalf of the South African Government:

The Government of the Republic of South Africa has decided to withdraw from the International Labour Organisation.

In reaching this decision it was influenced by an accumulation of hostile acts against South Africa, the more recent of which are set out hereunder.

1. The credentials of the South African Workers' delegate were invalidated at the 1963 Conference on the strength of a minority report by the Credentials Committee, which deprived South African workers of the full representation at the deliberations of an organisation established mainly for the benefit of the workers.

It has become obvious that the Republic cannot continue as a Member of an Organisation which is supposedly devoted to the interests of the worker but which suddenly, for purely political reasons, allows itself to be manoeuvred into a position in which the Workers' representative of South Africa is no longer acceptable. Since the organisation was established in 1919, South Africa, as one of its foundation Members, has been represented at all Conferences without any of its delegates being unseated.

2. This action against the South African Workers' delegate was immediately followed by the Governing Body of the Organisation deciding in June 1963, on the initiative and at the insistence of its Director-General, to exclude South Africa from membership of certain Industrial Committees of the Organisation, the effect of which has been to render entirely inoperative South Africa's participation in the activities of the Committees concerned.

3. Then further resolutions were adopted by the Governing Body at its meeting, held in Geneva from the 13th to the 17th February 1964, in pursuance of which the following steps, inter alia, are to be taken against South Africa:

(a) Any objection against the credentials of members of the South African delegation at the next Conference is to be dealt with as a matter of priority during the opening days of the Conference, quite clearly with the object of excluding South Africa from the Conference at the commencement of its proceedings.

(b) The submission to the next Conference of an amendment to the Constitution empowering a Conference to suspend from participation in its proceedings any member which has been found by the United Nations to follow a policy of racial discrimination, apartheid being quoted as the only example of such discrimination. Having regard to certain resolutions and a declaration adopted in the United Nations, the Government of the Republic can have little doubt, in the light of developments in the International Labour Organisation, but that any such amendment to the Constitution will inevitably lead to South Africa's being excluded from the Organisation. In view also of the vendetta of the Afro-Asian States, backed by the Communist States at the United Nations, such a resolution, although based on false premises, is obviously intended to make South Africa's membership of the International Labour Organisation untenable.

(c) The next Conference will be asked also to approve a programme for the elimination of apartheid in labour matters in the Republic in the light of various Conventions previously adopted by the Organisation which have not been ratified by South Africa and the acceptance or ratification of which, in terms of the Constitution of the Organisation, is entirely a matter within the discretion of a member State. Many other countries have also not ratified the Conventions quoted against South Africa, while others again have ratified the Conventions but are not honouring the obligations thus undertaken without any consequences of the nature now faced by South Africa.

(d) The proposed programme of action against South Africa is to be supported by a Declaration calling upon the Republic to renounce the policy of separate development and to repeal all legislative, administrative and other measures inconsistent with the terms of the Declaration. This is a clear case of deliberate interference in a country's domestic affairs, although it is claimed, in this connection, that the policies pursued by the Government have ceased to be solely the domestic concern of the Republic. It is significant, however, that no action is being taken against countries where there has in fact been—and still is—a grave violation of the principles underlying the Constitution of the Organisation. It is noteworthy also that the Organisation is acting in complete disregard of the benevolence of the policies pursued in South Africa, the effect of which has been to place its developing peoples on a much higher level than anywhere else in Africa, particularly as far as labour matters are concerned.

It has now become abundantly clear that the International Labour Organisation will refuse to proceed with its proper task and duties, as a non-political international organisation, while South Africa remains a Member. It is obvious, also, that it is not intended to retain South Africa as a Member functioning fully within its rights. The time has, therefore, come, more particularly as a result of the recent meeting of the Governing Body, for the Republic of South Africa to decide whether it should retire of its own free will or allow itself to be forced out with the resultant harm this will bring to an organisation which has already lost so much of its status. The Republic has chosen to leave the Organisation now, so as to give it an opportunity of attempting to return to the objectives for which it was established, if that be possible after the unhappy and unnecessary incursion into political recrimination between, and persecution of, fellow Members.

In deciding to withdraw from the Organisation, South Africa considers itself justified in acting on the same unilateral basis adopted by the Organisation in its attempts to curtail or terminate South Africa's membership. In view of the denial to South Africa of its basic rights as a Member, the South African Government accordingly does not consider itself bound by the provisions of the Constitution, in terms of which two years' notice of termination of membership must be given to the Organisation, and as from the date of notification to the Director-General of South Africa's withdrawal, all obligations towards the Organisation will be regarded as having been terminated, including the obligation with regard to South Africa's financial contribution to the Organisation for the current year.

The Government is not unmindful of the fact that certain Government delegates, as well as some of the Employers' and Workers' representatives from various countries, have resisted attempts to force South Africa out of the Organisation, and it wishes to express its appreciation of the support thus received from representatives of the countries concerned. The Republic will continue to co-operate with those countries—in whatever manner may prove feasible—in the field of labour relations and in the interests of the workers in South Africa.

Yours faithfully,

(Signed) Carel DE WET.

On 19 March 1964 the Director-General sent to the Minister of Foreign Affairs of the Republic of South Africa the following reply to the above letter:

Sir,

I have the honour to acknowledge receipt of the statement on behalf of the South African Government conveyed to me on your instructions on 11 March 1964 by the Ambassador of the Republic of South Africa to the United Kingdom.

I have taken due note of the decision of the Government of the Republic of South Africa to withdraw from the International Labour Organisation.

Article 1, paragraph 5, of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation provides as follows:

> No member of the International Labour Organisation may withdraw from the Organisation without giving notice of its intention so to do to the Director-General of the International Labour Office. Such notice shall take effect two years after the date of its reception by the Director-General subject to the Member having at that time fulfilled all financial obligations arising out of its membership. When a Member has ratified any international labour Convention, such withdrawal shall not affect the continued validity for the period provided for in the Convention of all obligations arising thereunder or relating thereto.

South Africa will accordingly, subject to having at that time fulfilled all financial obligations arising out of its membership, cease to be a Member of the International Labour Organisation on 11 March 1966.

Until that date the undertaking of the Government of South Africa, contained in the instrument of ratification of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation as amended in 1946, signed by the Prime Minister of the Union of South Africa at Pretoria on 12 June 1947, " faithfully to perform and carry out " all the stipulations of the Constitution, remains binding upon the Government of the Republic of South Africa.

In accordance with the terms of the Constitution South Africa will continue thereafter to be bound by all obligations arising under or relating to Conventions to which she is a party for the periods provided for therein.

Your statement will be communicated, together with this reply, to the Members of the Organisation and to the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, and it will be for the Governing Body and the Conference to determine what action they would now wish to take in respect of the proposals which are pending before the Conference and the terms of your communication. It is, however, my duty as Director-General to make immediately the following observations concerning the terms of your communication.

The gravity of the questions at issue between the International Labour Organisation and the Republic of South Africa is sufficiently attested by the prominence which these questions have received in recent discussions and decisions of the General Assembly of the United Nations and the Security Council as well as of the International Labour Organisation.

Throughout the consideration of these grave questions the International Labour Organisation has been guided by two unequivocal principles.

The first of these principles is that " all human beings, irrespective of race, creed or sex, have the right to pursue both their material well-being and their spiritual development in conditions of freedom and dignity, of economic security and equal opportunity ". This principle is described by article 1 of the Constitution of the Organisation as one of the objects for the promotion of which the International Labour Organisation exists.

The second principle is that of scrupulous respect for due process of law in all action taken to deal with the problems which have confronted the International Labour Organisation as the result of the issues which have arisen between South Africa and other Members of the Organisation which contend that South Africa has repudiated her solemn obligation to promote the equality of man.

The South African Government regards the action taken by the International Labour Organisation to uphold the first of these principles as " an accumulation of hostile acts " and, denying that the International Labour Organisation has acted by due process of law, claims that it is justified, at a stage when these matters are still pending before the International Labour Conference, in terminating unilaterally its obligations under the Constitution of the Organisation without regard to the provisions of the Constitution governing withdrawal.

The South African Government is clearly not entitled to terminate by unilateral action the obligations of South Africa under the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation. I therefore formally reserve the rights of the International Labour Organisation and of all its Members in respect of the grave issues raised by the statement communicated to me on your instructions on behalf of the Government of the Republic of South Africa.

I respectfully request you to bring this communication to the notice of the representative organisations of employers and workers recognised for the purpose of article 3 of the Constitution which have for so many years co-operated in the work of the International Labour Organisation.

I have the honour, etc.,

(Signed) David A. MORSE.

IRAQ

The ratification by Iraq of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation Instruments of Amendment (Nos. 1, 2 and 3), 1964, was received by the Director-General of the International Labour Office on 20 January 1966.

The text of the communication notifying ratification of these Instruments is as follows:

Baghdad, 10 January 1966.

Dear Mr. Morse,

With my letter No. 39182 dated 7.12.1965, I had the honour to inform you that Instruments Nos. 1, 2 and 3 for the Amendment of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation for 1964 were ratified by Law No. 165 for 1965, copies of which were enclosed in my letter abovementioned.

I have the honour to inform you that the aforesaid Law has been published in the Official Gazette (Al-Waqayi Al-Iraqiya) No. 1204 dated 8.12.65. Please be kind enough to take the necessary steps in accordance with the respective articles of the Instruments in question concerning registration of ratification.

I avail this opportunity to renew the assurance of my highest consideration.

Yours faithfully,

(Signed) Faris Nasser AL-HASSAN,
Minister of Labour and Social Affairs.

(Translation)

Niamey, 6 January 1966.

Sir,

In reply to your letter No. ILC 49-500-7 dated 9 August 1965, in which you invited the Government of Niger to consider the possibility of ratifying or accepting Amendment No. 1 to the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation, adopted at the 48th Session of the Conference in 1964, whereby article 35 of the Constitution is deleted and replaced by additional provisions in article 19, I have the honour to inform you that—" having seen and examined the said amendment, We hereby approve and accept it as a whole and in each of its several parts ".

With the assurance of my highest consideration.

Yours faithfully,

(Signed) Diori HAMANI,
President of the Republic.

TUNISIA

The acceptance by Tunisia of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation Instruments of Amendment (Nos. 1, 2 and 3), 1964, was received by the Director-General of the International Labour Office on 27 January 1966.

The text of the communication notifying acceptance of these Instruments is as follows:

(Translation)

Geneva, 27 January 1966.

The Permanent Mission of Tunisia to the European Office of the United Nations and the Specialised Agencies presents its compliments to the Director-General of the International Labour Office and has the honour to notify him of the acceptance by the Government of the Tunisian Republic of the three Instruments of Amendment to the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation adopted by the International Labour Conference at its 48th Session in Geneva.

1. The addition to article 19 of a ninth paragraph concerning the application of international labour Conventions to peoples which have not yet attained a full measure of self-government, and the deletion of article 35 (Geneva, 6 July 1964).

2. The insertion after the present paragraph 5 of article 1 of a paragraph concerning the exclusion from the I.L.O. of any Member which has been excluded from the United Nations or the suspension from the exercise of the rights and privileges involved in membership of the I.L.O. of any Member which has been suspended from the exercise of the rights and privileges involved in membership of the United Nations (Geneva, 9 July 1964).

3. Insertion at the end of the Constitution of the I.L.O. of a new article concerning the suspension from participation in the International Labour Conference of any Member of the I.L.O. which has been found by the United Nations to be flagrantly and persistently pursuing by its legislation a declared policy of racial discrimination such as apartheid (Geneva, 9 July 1964).

The Permanent Mission of Tunisia takes this opportunity of assuring the Director-General of the International Labour Office of its highest consideration.

UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND NORTHERN IRELAND

The ratification by the United Kingdom of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation Instrument of Amendment (No. 3), 1964, was received by the Director-General of the International Labour Office on 16 February 1966.

The text of the instrument of ratification is in terms similar to those of the instrument of ratification of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation Instrument of Amendment (No. 1), 1964.[1]

COSTA RICA

Ratification of the Social Policy (Basic Aims and Standards) Convention, 1962 (No. 117); the Hygiene (Commerce and Offices) Convention, 1964 (No. 120); and the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122).

The ratification by Costa Rica of Conventions Nos. 117, 120 and 122 was registered by the Director-General of the International Labour Office on 27 January 1966.

The text of the instrument of ratification of these Conventions is as follows:

(Translation)

I, Francisco J. ORLICH,
President of the Republic of Costa Rica,

Whereas the legislative assembly of the Republic in Decrees Nos. 3636, 3639 and 3640 of 10 December 1965 has approved the Convention concerning basic aims and standards of social policy, 1962, the Convention concerning hygiene in commerce and offices, 1964, and the Convention concerning employment policy, 1964, adopted by the International Labour Conference, and

Considering that the Government of the Republic, in accordance with the international obligations arising out of its adhesion to the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation, considers it eminently beneficial to the regulation of labour matters in the country that there should be international legal instruments governing the basic aims and standards of social policy, hygiene in commerce and offices and employment policy,

Hereby, in accordance with paragraph 10 of article 140 of the Political Constitution of the Republic;

Resolve that they shall be accepted and ratified, and treated henceforth as the law of the nation, and undertake that they shall be observed as a matter of national honour.

In faith whereof I sign the present Instrument of Ratification with my own hand, affix the Seal of the Nation hereto and cause the Minister of Foreign Affairs to append his signature.

Done in the Presidential Palace, San José, on the 14th day of January 1966.

(Signed) F. J. ORLICH.
(Countersigned) Mario GÓMEZ,
Minister of Foreign Affairs.

NEW ZEALAND

Cancellation of the Registration of the Ratification of the Reduction of Hours of Work (Textiles) Convention, 1937 (No. 61).

By letter dated 26 January 1966 addressed to the Director-General of the International Labour Office the Secretary of External Affairs of New Zealand transmitted a communication giving notice of the New Zealand Government's decision to terminate its engagement relating to the Reduction of Hours of Work (Textiles) Convention, 1937 (No. 61).

The text of the letter from the Secretary of External Affairs is as follows:

Wellington, 26 January 1966.

Sir,

I have the honour, by the direction of the Minister of External Affairs, to enclose a communication giving notice of the New Zealand Government's decision to terminate its engagement to be bound by the provisions of the Reduction of Hours of Work (Textiles) Convention, 1937 (Convention No. 61), which was adopted by the International Labour Conference on 22 June 1937, in the course of its 23rd Session.

I am to inform you that at the time of ratification the Government was satisfied that the principles embodied in the Convention were already in operation in the textiles industry by reason of various awards of the Court of Arbitration. It was also contemplated that such administrative measures as might prove necessary should be taken both to reinforce the awards and to ensure compliance with the provisions of the Convention, particularly those limiting the working of overtime. It has, however, become increasingly apparent that the overtime limits laid down in the Convention no longer correspond to present-day needs and conditions in the textiles industry in New Zealand.

I am also to explain that the Government, in reaching its decision, has been influenced by the fact that this Convention, in the 29 years since its adoption, has not entered into force. The New Zealand Government, bearing in mind that its own ratification has stood alone for 28 years, has reluctantly concluded that the Convention is unlikely to prove a serviceable international agreement, or to make a genuine contribution to the International Labour Code. In these circumstances it has seemed that the interests of the Organisation will best be served by retracting the only endorsement which this Convention has received.

The Minister will be grateful if you will in due course inform him of the action taken to give effect to the Government's decision.

I have the honour to be, etc.,

(Signed) A. D. McINTOSH,
Secretary of External Affairs.

The text of the communication from the Minister of External Affairs of New Zealand informing the Director-General of the decision taken by his Government to terminate its engagement relating to the Reduction of Hours of Work (Textiles) Convention, 1937 (No. 61), is as follows:

Wellington, 26 January 1966.

Sir,

On 22 June 1937, in the course of its 23rd Session, the General Conference of the International Labour Organisation adopted a Convention (No. 61) concerning the reduction of hours of work in the textile industry. This Convention, which was to be cited as the Reduction of Hours of Work (Textiles) Convention, 1937, was to come into force 12 months after the date on which the ratifications of two Members had been registered with the Secretary-General of the League of Nations—whose functions in this regard have since been entrusted to the Director-General of the International Labour Office.

In accordance with the procedure contemplated in the Convention, the formal ratification of the Government of New Zealand was communicated for registration, and was registered on 29 March 1938. The Convention has not however been ratified by any other Member, and therefore remains ineffectual.

In the circumstances the Government of New Zealand has decided to terminate its engagement to be bound by the provisions of the Reduction of Hours of Work (Textiles) Convention, 1937, and desires that the registration of its instrument of ratification be cancelled.

I shall be glad, therefore, if you will see that registration of the instrument is cancelled accordingly.

(Signed) Keith HOLYOAKE,
Minister of External Affairs.

The Director-General of the International Labour Office informed the Governing Body at its 164th Session, held in February-March 1966, of his intention to cancel, at the request of the Government of New Zealand, the registration of the ratification by New Zealand of Convention No. 61.

The text of the document in which the Governing Body was informed of the Director-General's intention is as follows:

Cancellation of the Registration of the Ratification by New Zealand of the Reduction of Hours of Work (Textiles) Convention, 1937 (No. 61)

1. At its 23rd Session in 1937 the Conference adopted the Reduction of Hours of Work (Textiles) Convention. New Zealand is the only State which has ratified this Convention, its ratification having been registered on 29 March 1938. In accordance with Article 17, paragraph 2, the Convention comes into force when ratified by two member States; it has therefore not yet entered into force.

2. On 26 January 1966 the Minister of External Affairs of New Zealand communicated to the Director-General of the International Labour Office a letter in which he stated that, since the Convention had not been ratified by any other Member and therefore remained ineffectual, the Government of New Zealand had decided to terminate its engagement to be bound by the Convention and requested that the registration of its ratification should be cancelled. In a letter bearing the same date the Secretary of External Affairs of New Zealand stated:

[The text of this letter is reproduced on p. 210.]

3. The request of the Government of New Zealand does not involve the denunciation of this Convention. Denunciation could, in fact, take place only after its entry into force. If this Convention had come into force some time after its ratification by New Zealand more than 27 years ago, New Zealand would have had an opportunity of denouncing the Convention ten years after its entry into force, in conformity with its terms. In the present circumstances, however, as New Zealand cannot denounce the Convention, it has requested that the registration of its ratification be cancelled.

4. In the special circumstances of the case, and in the light of the very long period of time which has elapsed since New Zealand ratified the Convention and the fact that there has been no other ratification, it would appear that the request of the Government of New Zealand should be granted.

5. The Director-General therefore proposes to accede to the request made by the Government and to cancel the registration of the ratification by New Zealand of the Reduction of Hours of Work (Textiles) Convention, 1937.

6. It is recalled that the Director-General in 1954 had occasion to accede to a similar request made by the Government of New Zealand and to cancel the registration of the ratification by New Zealand of the Reduction of Hours of Work (Public Works) Convention, 1936 (No. 51), for similar reasons. At that time the Director-General had brought the matter to the attention of the Governing Body which, at its 127th Session (November 1954), had taken note of the action which the Director-General proposed to take.

7. The Governing Body is accordingly requested to take note of the action which the Director-General proposes to take with regard to the request of the Government of New Zealand as indicated in paragraph 5 above.

The Governing Body took note of the above document on 4 March 1966.

By letter dated 7 March 1966 the Director-General of the International Labour Office communicated to the Government of New Zealand his decision to cancel the registration of the Convention.

The text of the letter from the Director-General is as follows:

Geneva, 7 March 1966.

Sir,

I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your communication of 26 January 1966 giving notice of the New Zealand Government's decision to terminate its engagement to be bound by the provisions of the Reduction of Hours of Work (Textiles) Convention, 1937 (No. 61).

As pointed out by you, the formal ratification of the Convention by the Government of New Zealand was registered about 28 years ago and no other State Member of the I.L.O. has since ratified the Convention. In view of the long period of time which has thus elapsed since the ratification by New Zealand of the Convention, and the fact that the ratification constitutes the sole ratification of the Convention, I have decided to cancel the registration of the ratification of the Convention by New Zealand.

The Governing Body was informed of my intention to take this action and I am enclosing herewith a copy of the note submitted for this purpose to its 164th Session (Geneva, February-March 1966).

In accordance with usual practice, this correspondence will be published in the Official Bulletin.

I have the honour to be, etc.,

For the Director-General:
(Signed) C. W. JENKS,
Deputy Director-General.

The cancellation was registered by the Director-General on 4 March 1966.

I, Alfredo STROESSNER,

President of the Republic of Paraguay,

To all who may see these presents make known:

That during the General Conference of the International Labour Organisation held at Washington there was adopted on the 29th day of October 1919 the Convention limiting the hours of work in industrial undertakings to eight in the day and forty-eight in the week,

And that, the said Convention having been approved and ratified by Act No. 946, approved by the Honourable House of Representatives on the tenth day of July in the year one thousand nine hundred and sixty-four and promulgated by the Executive on the fifteenth day of the same month and year,

By these presents I do accept, confirm and ratify the said Convention in all its parts, engaging and binding myself in the name of the Nation faithfully to observe it and have it implemented.

In faith whereof, I do sign the present Instrument of Ratification, sealed with the Seal of the Republic and countersigned by the Minister, Secretary of State in the Department of External Relations, Dr. Raúl SAPENA PASTOR, in the city of Asunción, Capital of the Republic of Paraguay, on the third day of November in the year one thousand nine hundred and sixty-five.

Documents of the International Labour Conference (49th Session)

In connection with the 49th Session of the Conference (June 1965) the Office published the following document.

Record of Proceedings [2]

The Record of Proceedings of the 49th Session of the International Labour Conference is divided as follows: Introduction, reproducing the letter addressed by the Director-General of the International Labour Office to the governments of member States regarding the convocation of the Conference, the agenda, the place and date of the session and the composition and attendance of delegations, and enclosing a memorandum giving further details; First Part, setting out the list of members of delegations, etc., comprising the names of all persons who took part in the Conference, classified according to the functions they performed; Second Part, containing a verbatim report of the proceedings in plenary sitting; and Third Part, consisting of Appendices, including the reports and documents submitted by the various Conference committees and the texts (Conventions, Recommendations, resolutions, etc.) adopted by the Conference. The Record of Proceedings terminates with an alphabetical index to the Second and Third Parts.

Reports Prepared for the International Labour Conference (50th Session)

In preparation for the 50th Session of the International Labour Conference (June 1966) the Office has published the following reports.

Report of the Director-General (Part I) [3]

This year the Director-General has chosen as the subject for his Report " Industrialisation and Labour ". It is directed primarily at the problems of industrialisation as they arise in the developing countries, drawing attention to various social and labour problems which directly influence both the course and the speed of industrialisation, and in respect of which appropriate action by the I.L.O. may contribute in a positive way to accelerating the realisation of the aspirations of the industrialising countries.

Chapter I deals with industrialisation and labour policy, Chapter II with human resources policy as an aid to industrialisation, Chapter III with social adjustment in industrialisation, and Chapter IV with the I.L.O.'s contribution to industrialisation.

Report of the Director-General (Part II) [1]

Part II of the Report of the Director-General—which also constitutes the 20th Report of the International Labour Organisation to the United Nations—covers primarily the activities of the I.L.O. during 1965. The matters covered fall under the following headings: major developments; conditions of work and life; development of human resources; development of social institutions; and concerted action in specific fields. The action taken on the resolutions adopted by the International Labour Conference at its 45th (1961) to 49th (1965) Sessions is summarised in an appendix.

The Role of Co-operatives in the Economic and Social Development of Developing Countries [2]

The first part of the present report, prepared on the basis of replies from 82 governments, reproduces the essential points in their observations and in every case the observations relating directly to the provisions of the text submitted to them for examination in Report IV (1) [3]; it also contains comments on those observations. The second part contains the English and French versions of the proposed Recommendation as amended in the light of the observations made by governments and for the reasons set out in the Office commentary.

Revision of Conventions Nos. 35, 36, 37, 38, 39 and 40 concerning Old-age, Invalidity and Survivors' Pensions [4]

The present report has been prepared on the basis of the replies received from 66 governments to the preliminary report [5]; the substance of these replies is reproduced in Chapter I, while Chapter II contains a commentary on them and presents Proposed Conclusions.

Questions concerning Fishermen [6]

In accordance with article 38 of the Standing Orders of the International Labour Conference the International Labour Office prepared and transmitted to the governments of member States a report [7] containing the record of the Preparatory Technical Conference on Fishermen's Questions (Geneva, 18-28 October 1965), together with the texts of the Conclusions adopted by that Conference as a basis for the discussion by the International Labour Conference at its 50th (1966) Session with a view to the adoption of international instruments. The Conclusions deal with three questions: accommodation on board fishing vessels; vocational training of fishermen; and fishermen's certificates of competency. The report also contained a questionnaire.

The first part of the present report contains general observations made by certain governments and an analysis of their replies to the questionnaire. The second part contains the English and French versions of the proposed Conventions and the proposed Recommendation.

Second Special Report of the Director-General on the Application of the Declaration concerning the Policy of "Apartheid" of the Republic of South Africa [1]

The present report [2] is the second of a series of special reports to be submitted every year for consideration by the International Labour Conference in accordance with operative paragraph 6 of the Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid of the Republic of South Africa, adopted unanimously by the Conference at its 48th Session.

Chapter I discusses separate development and trends in practice and theory; Chapter II deals with apartheid labour policies and the South African economy; Chapter III recounts developments in the United Nations and in the I.L.O. in regard to the situation in South Africa; and Chapter IV puts forward proposals for the future.

How to Read a Balance Sheet [3]

This programmed manual has its origin in a sector of the technical assistance work of the I.L.O. designed to assist economic and social progress in the less industrialised countries by spreading knowledge of sound management techniques. It is designed so as to present the subject in a way in which it can be most easily and effectively mastered by a wide variety of persons with limited time for personal study, including not only managers of enterprises, but also trade union officials and persons concerned with public affairs at the local or national level. The method chosen offers many of the benefits of expert teaching and enables the individual to learn at his own pace and to make use of any spell of free time.

The programme first teaches the structure and language of a balance sheet and then goes on to illustrate some of the ways in which it can be used to assess a company's position. It provides basic information about the structure of the enterprise's resources and its responsibilities to and relations with owners and other bodies or persons. The manual uses a limited number of terms, but has a short glossary of alternative terms that the reader may subsequently encounter when he is looking at balance sheets.

Preparatory Technical Conference on the Maximum Permissible Weight to Be Carried by One Worker

(Geneva, 25 January-4 February 1966)

Note on the General Discussion and Text of the Proposed Conclusions with a view to the Adoption of a Convention and a Recommendation

The Governing Body has on several occasions since its 152nd Session (June 1962) given consideration to the question of the maximum permissible weight to be carried by one worker as a topic for possible inclusion in the agenda of the International Labour Conference. At its 160th Session (November 1964), when examining the Director-General's proposals concerning the date, place and agenda of the 50th (1966) Session of the Conference, it decided not to include this topic in the agenda of that session, it being understood that consideration would be given, in connection with the discussions on the draft budget for 1966, to the possibility of convening during that year a preparatory technical conference on the subject. Subsequently, at its 163rd Session (November 1965), it decided to place the question of the maximum permissible weight to be carried by one worker on the agenda of the 51st (1967) Session of the International Labour Conference, the exact scope of the item to be determined in the light of the conclusions of the Preparatory Technical Conference.

In accordance with these decisions the Preparatory Technical Conference met in Geneva from 25 January to 4 February 1966. Its agenda was as follows: Maximum permissible weight to be carried by one worker.

States Members were invited to send tripartite delegations. Twenty-nine countries were represented by 110 delegates; four countries were represented by observers. Four intergovernmental organisations accepted the invitation to participate in the Conference, and six international non-governmental organisations sent observers.

The Governing Body was represented by a delegation composed of Mr. R. PURPURA (Italy) for the Government group, Mr. M. MONTT BALMACEDA (Chilean) for the Employers' group, and Mr. G. WEISSENBERG (Austrian) for the Workers' group.

The Conference unanimously elected as President Mr. DRACHMANN (Government delegate, Denmark) and, in accordance with the proposals made by the three groups, appointed as Vice-Presidents the following delegates:

Government group : Mr. ZELENÝ (Czechoslovakia).

Employers' group : Mr. VIVIANI (Italy).

Workers' group : Mr. DEKEYZER (Belgium).

Mr. H. BLANCO MELO (Government delegate, Mexico) was appointed Reporter.

This note contains a summary of the discussion in plenary sitting and reproduces the texts of the Proposed Conclusions with a view to the adoption of a Convention and the Proposed Conclusions with a view to the adoption of a Recommendation concerning the maximum permissible weight to be carried by one worker.

DISCUSSION IN PLENARY SITTING

Opening Speeches

The Secretary-General, Mr. H. A. Majid, after declaring the Conference open, stressed the importance of the question under consideration. He pointed out that the manual transport of loads was one of the most common causes of occupational accidents at work and led to a great many chronic medical disorders; governments were adopting an increasing number of provisions to regulate the carrying of loads. The matter was of interest to a great many workers and had been raised several times in the Industrial Committees of the I.L.O.

General Discussion

The Conference had before it two reports prepared by the Office. Report I contained an analysis of the problem, the report of the Meeting of Experts on the Maximum Permissible Weight to Be Carried by One Worker, which had been convened by the Governing Body in 1964, an outline of national law and practice, and a questionnaire on the points proposed for discussion. Report II contained replies of governments to the questionnaire and their comments, an analysis of their replies and the Proposed Conclusions. The Conference also had before it for consideration a document containing the replies from some other governments, which it had not been possible to include in Report II.

During the general discussion some speakers stressed that the manual carrying of loads was a particularly arduous form of work and mentioned the risks of fatigue, accident and physical deterioration involved. They also pointed out that those risks led to economic losses and had considerable social repercussions. It was therefore desirable to introduce standardisation at the international level in order to make sure that such work was carried out in safe conditions. Some other speakers stressed the great difficulty of defining the principle of maximum weight because of the many factors involved. It seemed impossible to fix a maximum weight which would at the same time take all those factors into account and be universally applicable in all countries and in all circumstances.

Lengthy discussions took place as to whether the various points in the Proposed Conclusions should be considered with a view to recommending the adoption of a Convention, either with or without a supplementary Recommendation, or whether those points should be considered only with a view to adopting a Recommendation. The Workers' members of the Conference, and some Government members, stressed the advantages to be gained by adopting a Convention, which would permit uniform standards concerning maximum weight to be applied in all countries and enable the health and safety of workers to be more effectively safeguarded. The Employers' members, and some Government members, held that it was impossible in practice to implement rigid standards in this field, owing to the wide variety of conditions obtaining in different countries and to certain features peculiar to the manual transport of loads; they argued that it would be more realistic for the Conference to confine itself to considering the adoption of a Recommendation.

In order to accelerate the work of the Conference, the Chairmen of the Employers' and Workers' groups asked for the Conference's permission to re-examine within their groups points on which their opinions differed, with a view to finding common ground and facilitating the discussion on the nature of the instruments and on other points of the Proposed Conclusions. Following this re-examination, two amendments were submitted, one by the Employers' group and the other by the Workers' group, both of which defined the character of the instruments to be examined and specified their contents.

Proposed Conclusions with a view to the Adoption of a Convention concerning the Maximum Permissible Weight to Be Carried by One Worker

The document submitted by the Workers' group, which called for the adoption of a Convention supplemented by a Recommendation, was adopted after a record vote. The Conference then appointed an ad hoc working party to discuss the contents of a proposed Convention on the basis of the document submitted by the Workers' group. The proposals of the Working Party, as amended by the Conference, were then adopted.

During the adoption of the Proposed Conclusions by the Conference the Employers' group said that they would vote against the Proposed Conclusions with a view to the adoption of a Convention because they felt that the principles contained therein were too general for inclusion in a Convention. If the text submitted by the Workers' group were adopted, the result would be a text which would be so vague as to undermine the very concept of Conventions as it was now understood, a concept which they were concerned to maintain. As regards the Proposed Conclusions with a view to the adoption of a Recommendation they would abstain from voting because they considered that certain points of the Proposed Conclusions were unrealistic; they hoped, however, that the necessary modifications could be made before the 51st Session of the International Labour Conference.

The Conference adopted the Proposed Conclusions with a view to the adoption of a Convention concerning the maximum permissible weight to be carried by one worker by 35 votes to 17, with 8 abstentions.

Proposed Conclusions with a view to the Adoption of a Recommendation concerning the Maximum Permissible Weight to Be Carried by One Worker

The Conference decided to set up an ad hoc working party to examine the various amendments submitted to the Proposed Conclusions with a view to the adoption of a Recommendation and to submit to the Conference an amended text in which the suggestions contained in these amendments were taken into account as far as possible.

The Working Party had discussed in particular whether it was appropriate to specify maximum permissible weights for the various categories of workers in accordance with the relevant points in the Proposed Conclusions. In the light of the objections raised in this connection in the general discussion, as well as in view of the many amendments submitted, the Working Party considered that it was difficult to make concrete proposals on so controversial a question. It considered, however, that whereas for young workers and women very many factors had to be taken into account which it was difficult to bring under a common denominator, this question could be discussed without such difficulty in the case of adult male workers. The Working Party considered that, if agreement could be reached on specifying a maximum weight for men, this would provide a useful standard of reference for determining maximum weights for women and young workers, and decided to suggest that the maximum for men should be fixed at 50 kilogrammes.

Subject to certain modifications and to reservations by some governments concerning the provisions applicable to pregnant women, which they considered too vague, the Conference adopted, by 38 votes to 0, with 22 abstentions, the Working Party's text of the Proposed Conclusions with a view to the adoption of a Recommendation concerning the maximum permissible weight to be carried by one worker.

PROPOSED CONCLUSIONS ADOPTED

1. International instruments concerning the maximum permissible weight to be carried by one worker should be adopted.

2. The instruments should take the form of a Convention supplemented by a Recommendation.

Proposed Conclusions with a view to the Adoption of a Convention concerning the Maximum Permissible Weight to Be Carried by One Worker

3. For the purpose of the instrument, the term " manual transport of loads " should mean any transport in which the weight of the load is wholly borne by the worker; it should cover the lifting and putting down of loads.

4. For the purpose of the instrument, the term " regular manual transport of loads " should mean any activity which is continuously or principally devoted to the manual transport of loads, or which normally includes the manual transport of loads, even intermittently.

5. No worker should be required, authorised or permitted to engage in the manual transport of a load which by reason of its weight is likely to jeopardise his health or safety.

6. In order to reduce or facilitate the lifting, carrying and putting down of manually transported loads, suitable technical devices should be used as much as possible.

7. In the application of the instrument, Members should take account of the conditions, such as climate, altitude and topography, in which the work is to be performed.

8. The assignment of young persons and women to regular manual transport of loads other than light loads should be limited. Maximum loads required of young persons and women should be of a substantially lesser weight than those assigned to adult male workers.

9. Each Member should take appropriate steps to ensure that any worker assigned to regular manual transport of loads other than light loads shall, prior to taking up these duties, receive adequate training in working techniques, with a view to safeguarding health and preventing accidents.

10. Each Member should, by laws or regulations or any other method consistent with national practice and conditions, and in consultation with the most representative organisations of employers and workers concerned, take such steps as may be necessary to give effect to the provisions of the instrument.

Proposed Conclusions with a view to the Adoption of a Recommendation concerning the Maximum Permissible Weight to Be Carried by One Worker

I. Definition and Scope

11. For the purpose of the instrument, the term " manual transport of loads " should mean any transport in which the weight of the load is wholly borne by the worker; it should cover the lifting and putting down of loads.

12. For the purpose of the instrument, the term " regular manual transport of loads " should mean any activity which is continuously or principally devoted to the manual transport of loads, or which normally includes the manual transport of loads, even intermittently.

13. Except as otherwise provided in the text, the instrument should apply both to regular and to occasional manual transport of loads other than light loads.

14. The instrument should apply to all branches of economic activity.

II. General Principle

15. No worker should be required, authorised or permitted to engage in the manual transport of a load which by reason of its weight is likely to jeopardise his health or safety.

III. Training and Instructions

16. (1) Any worker assigned to regular manual transport of loads should, prior to taking up his duties, receive adequate training or instruction in working techniques, with a view to safeguarding health and preventing accidents.

(2) Such training or instruction should include methods of lifting, carrying, putting down, unloading and stacking of different types of loads, and should be given by suitably qualified persons; wherever appropriate, recourse could be had to persons or institutions approved by the competent authority after consultation with the most representative organisations of employers and workers concerned.

17. Any worker occasionally assigned to manual transport of loads should be given appropriate instructions by a competent person on the manner in which such operations may be safely carried out.

IV. Medical Examinations

18. A medical examination for fitness for employment should be required before assignment to regular manual transport of loads, as far as practicable and appropriate.

19. Further medical examinations should be made from time to time as necessary.

20. Regulations concerning the examinations provided for in Points 18 and 19 should be determined by the competent authority after consultation with the most representative organisations of employers and workers concerned.

21. The examination provided for in Point 18 should be certified. Such certification should attest fitness for employment but should not contain medical data.

V. Technical Devices and Packaging

22. In order to reduce or facilitate the lifting, carrying and putting down of manually transported loads, suitable technical devices should be used as much as possible.

23. The packaging of loads which may be transported manually should be compact and of suitable material and, as far as possible, equipped with devices for holding and so designed as not to create risk of injury; for example, it should not have sharp edges, projections or rough surfaces.

VI. Maximum Weight

24. (1) In the application of the instrument, Members should take account of the environmental conditions, such as climate, altitude, topography, etc., in which the work is to be performed.

(2) Members should also take account of other conditions which may influence the health and safety of the worker.

A. Men Workers

25. Where the maximum permissible weight to be carried by one adult male worker is more than 50 kilogrammes, measures should be taken as speedily as possible to reduce it to that level.

B. Young Workers

26. The provisions of the instrument relating to young workers should apply to persons under 18 years of age.

27. The assignment of young workers to manual transport of loads should be limited to the greatest possible extent.

28. Maximum loads required of young workers should be of a substantially lesser weight than those assigned to adult male workers.

29. Where the minimum age for assignment to manual transport of loads is less than 16 years, measures should be taken as speedily as possible to raise it to that level.

30. The minimum age for assignment to regular manual transport of loads should be raised, with a view to attaining a minimum age of 18 years.

31. Where young workers are assigned to regular manual transport of loads, provision should be made—

(a) as appropriate, to reduce the time spent on actual lifting, carrying and putting down of loads by such workers;

(b) to prohibit the assignment of such workers to particular tasks comprised in manual transport of loads which are especially arduous.

C. Women Workers

32. The assignment of women to manual transport of loads should be limited.

33. Maximum loads required of women should be of a substantially lesser weight than those assigned to adult male workers.

34. No woman should be assigned to manual transport of loads during a pregnancy which has been medically determined or during the ten weeks following confinement.

35. Where women workers are assigned to regular manual transport of loads, provision should be made—

(a) as appropriate, to reduce the time spent on actual lifting, carrying and putting down of loads by such workers;

(b) to prohibit the assignment of such workers to particular tasks comprised in manual transport of loads which are especially arduous.

VII. Other Measures to Protect Health and Safety

36. After receiving medical opinion and in consultation with the most representative organisations of employers and workers concerned, the competent authority, bearing in mind all the relevant conditions of the work, should make efforts to ensure that the exertion required in a working day or shift of workers manually transporting loads is not likely to jeopardise the health or safety of such workers.

37. Workers engaged in manual transport of loads should be supplied with such suitable devices and equipment as may be necessary to safeguard their health and safety.

VIII. Miscellaneous Provisions

38. The training or instruction and the medical examination provided for in the instrument should not involve the worker in any expense.

39. The competent authority should actively promote scientific research, including ergonomics, concerning the manual transport of loads with the object, inter alia, of—

(a) determining the relationship, if any, between occupational diseases and disorders and manual transport of loads; and

(b) minimising the hazards to health and safety of workers engaged in the manual transport of loads.

40. Where methods of transportation of goods by pulling and pushing are prevalent which impose physical strains analogous to those involved in the manual transport of loads, the competent authority should give consideration to the application to such work of such provisions of the instrument as may be appropriate.

41. Each Member should, by laws or regulations or any other method consistent with national practice and conditions, and in consultation with the most representative organisations of employers and workers concerned, take such steps as may be necessary to give effect to the provisions of the instrument.

42. Members should be allowed to permit exceptions to the application of particular provisions of the instrument after consultation with the national inspection service and with the most representative organisations of employers and workers concerned, where the circumstances of the work or the nature of the loads require such exceptions; for every exception or category of exceptions the limits of the derogation should be specified.

43. Each Member should, in accordance with national practice, specify the person or persons on whom the obligation rests for compliance with the provisions of the instrument, as well as the authority responsible for the supervision of the application of the provisions of the instrument.

Report by the Director-General concerning Action on the Resolution concerning Southern Rhodesia Adopted by the Governing Body at Its 163rd Session (November 1965)

1. In the course of its 163rd Session, on 19 November 1965, the Governing Body adopted a resolution on Southern Rhodesia, the operative paragraph of which requested the Director-General—

(a) to inform the Secretary-General of the United Nations that the International Labour Organisation will do everything in its power to contribute in its own sphere to such action as may be decided upon by the Security Council;

(b) to refrain from having any official or unofficial contacts, direct or indirect, with the illegal régime in Southern Rhodesia;

(c) to keep abreast of developments in the situation and to report to the Governing Body at its next session.

2. In accordance with clause (a) of this operative paragraph the resolution was communicated to the Secretary-General of the United Nations on 19 November 1965, and was circulated the same day as Security Council document S/6957.

3. In pursuance of clause (b) of the operative paragraph of the resolution the Director-General on 26 November 1965 issued an instruction to all members of the staff of the Office to ensure that there should be no official or unofficial contacts, direct or indirect, by correspondence or otherwise, with the illegal régime in Southern Rhodesia. There have been no official or unofficial contacts, direct or indirect, between the I.L.O. and the illegal régime in Southern Rhodesia since the adoption of the resolution.

4. The present report is intended, in accordance with clause (c) of the operative paragraph of the resolution, to keep the Governing Body informed of developments in the situation in so far as they may affect action by the I.L.O. Parts I to III review the past association of Southern Rhodesia in the work of the I.L.O., dealing respectively with representation at I.L.O. meetings, the applicability and implementation of international labour Conventions, and technical co-operation. Part IV reviews developments concerning the territory in other international organisations. In Part V certain proposals are made regarding the principles to govern further action by the I.L.O. on the question of Southern Rhodesia.

Part I. Representation of Southern Rhodesia at I.L.O. Meetings

5. Southern Rhodesia is not represented as of right at any I.L.O. meetings.

6. On the invitation of the Governing Body, made at the request of the Government of the United Kingdom as the responsible member State, a tripartite observer delegation from the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland participated in the 42nd to 47th Sessions of the Conference (1958-63).

7. After the dissolution of the Federation the Governing Body, on the recommendation of the United Kingdom Government, invited Southern Rhodesia, through the United Kingdom Government, to send a tripartite observer delegation to the 48th (1964) Session of the Conference. Such a delegation was present at that Conference.

8. The Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland was invited by the Governing Body to participate in the First African Regional Conference at Lagos in 1960, and took part in that Conference. Southern Rhodesia was not invited to participate in the Second African Regional Conference at Addis Ababa in 1964.

9. The Government of the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland was a member of the African Advisory Committee from 1959 to 1964, and was represented at the First and Second Sessions of that Committee in 1959 and 1962. The Government of Southern Rhodesia has never been a member of the African Advisory Committee and no person from Southern Rhodesia is now either an Employers' or Workers' member or substitute member of the Committee.

10. In March 1965 the Governing Body, at its 161st Session, rejected by 25 votes to 10, with 9 abstentions, a proposal that Southern Rhodesia should be invited, through the United Kingdom Government, to send a tripartite observer delegation to the 49th (1965) Session of the Conference.

11. No other question relating to Southern Rhodesia's participation in I.L.O. meetings remains outstanding in present circumstances.

Part II. Applicability and Implementation of International Labour Conventions in Southern Rhodesia

I. Declarations concerning the Applicability of Conventions

Status of Southern Rhodesia in regard to I.L.O. Conventions.

12. As a non-metropolitan territory for whose international relations the United Kingdom is responsible, Southern Rhodesia has been subject to the provisions of article 35 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation concerning the application of ratified Conventions to such territories, as well as to the special provisions on the same question included in certain Conventions. As Southern Rhodesia has since 1923 enjoyed self-governing powers over most of the matters dealt with in I.L.O. Conventions, it has been the practice of the United Kingdom Government to make any declarations concerning the acceptance of the obligations of Conventions on behalf of the territory with the agreement of the Government of Southern Rhodesia.

Conventions Accepted without Modification.

13. The following Conventions have been accepted on behalf of Southern Rhodesia, the respective declarations having been registered on the dates indicated:

Convention	Declaration registered
Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29)	20 March 1933
Recruiting of Indigenous Workers Convention, 1936 (No. 50)	11 March 1940
Social Policy (Non-Metropolitan Territories) Convention, 1947 (No. 82)	27 March 1950
Right of Association (Non-Metropolitan Territories) Convention, 1947 (No. 84)	,,
Labour Inspectorates (Non-Metropolitan Territories) Convention, 1947 (No. 85)	,,
Contracts of Employment (Indigenous Workers) Convention, 1947 (No. 86)	,,
Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105)	7 July 1959

In addition, the following Conventions were the subject of declarations of acceptance without modification pursuant to the Labour Standards (Non-Metropolitan Territories) Convention, 1947 (No. 83); however, as the latter Convention has not received the number of ratifications necessary for its entry into force, these declarations also have not yet taken effect:

Convention	Declaration registered
Weekly Rest (Industry) Convention, 1921 (No. 14)	27 March 1950
Equality of Treatment (Accident Compensation) Convention, 1925 (No. 19)	,,
Underground Work (Women) Convention, 1935 (No. 45)	,,

Conventions Accepted with Modifications.

14. One declaration of acceptance subject to modifications is at present in force, in respect of the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) [1], registered on 11 April 1960. Three other Conventions were the subject of declarations of this kind made under the Labour Standards (Non-Metropolitan Territories) Convention, 1947 (No. 83), and are therefore not yet in force:

Convention	Declaration registered
Maternity Protection Convention, 1919 (No. 3) [2]	27 March 1950
Workmen's Compensation (Accidents) Convention, 1925 (No. 17) [3] . . .	,,
Minimum Age (Industry) Convention (Revised), 1936 (No. 59) [4]	,, Declarations in respect of Conventions Not Accepted.

15. A number of declarations has been made in respect of Conventions ratified by the United Kingdom or listed in the Labour Standards (Non-Metropolitan Territories) Convention, 1947, indicating non-acceptance of their provisions by Southern Rhodesia. Thirteen maritime Conventions and a Convention on safety in dock work have been declared inapplicable, Southern Rhodesia having no seaboard. Declarations indicating that a decision was reserved have been made in respect of 31 other Conventions. These include three instruments in the field of freedom of association [5], four Conventions concerning minimum wages and the protection of wages [6], five Conventions relating to the employment of women and young persons [7], two Conventions concerning employment services [8], two Conventions in the field

[1] The modifications regarding the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947, were as follows:

Article 6: The inspection staff is augmented by officials appointed by the Central Authority on the recommendation of the Joint Council of Employers and Employees of the industry concerned, and paid from Joint Council funds.

Article 12 (1) (c) (iv): There is no authority at present under which this requirement can be met, but legislation which will remedy this is to be enacted.

In addition, Part II of the Convention, concerning labour inspection in commerce, has been excluded.

[2] The modification regarding the Maternity Protection Convention, 1919, was as follows:

The provisions of this Convention will be applied with the exclusion of Article 3 (c).

[3] The modification regarding the Workmen's Compensation (Accidents) Convention, 1925, was as follows:

The provisions of this Convention will be applied with the exclusion of private domestic servants in Article 2.

[4] The modifications regarding the Minimum Age (Industry) Convention (Revised), 1937, were as follows:

The provisions of this Convention will be applied save that, as regards Article 2, " fifteen years " will be modified to " twelve years "; as regards Article 4, " eighteen years " will be modified to " sixteen years "; and there is no registration of African births in the colony.

of occupational safety [1], a Convention on paid holidays in agriculture [2], 12 Conventions in the field of social security [3], a Convention on labour statistics [4] and a Convention on migration for employment.[5] A decision has been reserved in the case of all Conventions dealing specifically with agricultural workers which have been the subject of declarations; they relate to the right of association, minimum age, minimum wages, holidays with pay, workmen's compensation and sickness, old-age, invalidity and survivors' insurance.

II. Implementation of Conventions

A. Standards relating to Basic Human Rights.

Conventions concerning Forced Labour.

16. As already noted, both the Forced Labour Convention, 1930, and the Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957, have been accepted on behalf of Southern Rhodesia. As regards the former, except for certain emergency legislation in force during the Second World War and repealed shortly after its end, the reports supplied in accordance with article 22 of the I.L.O. Constitution have stated that no forced or compulsory labour existed in the territory. On the other hand, since the submission of the first report on the 1957 Convention, for the period 1958-60, the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations has made a series of comments regarding the implementation of this instrument, in the first instance in the form of requests addressed directly to the Government (1961, 1963) and subsequently in the form of observations published in its reports (1964, 1965). The subject-matter of these comments is analysed below.[6]

Forced Labour for Political Purposes.

17. The Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957, prohibits the use of any form of forced or compulsory labour (including, as noted by the Committee of Experts, prison labour) as a means of political coercion or education or as a punishment for holding or expressing political views or views ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system. The Committee of Experts has referred to various provisions of the Law and Order (Maintenance) Act, the African Affairs Act and the Unlawful Organisations Act as involving or liable to involve forced or compulsory labour contrary to this provision, particularly in regard to the following matters:

(a) The Committee noted that, under the Law and Order (Maintenance) Act, the authorities might prohibit particular publications or all publications by particular persons or associations if, in their opinion, such publications were likely to be contrary to the interests of public safety or security; any person who printed, published, disseminated, etc., any such publication was liable to imprisonment (involving, by virtue of the prisons legislation, an obligation to perform labour). While noting the statement of the Southern Rhodesian Government that these provisions would be invoked only in the interests of safety and security, the Committee observed that they made it possible to prohibit particular persons or associations, subject to penalties involving compulsory labour, from publishing any views, thus including political views or views opposed to the established political, social or economic system. Referring to a particular instance of the exercise of these powers, the Committee further observed that, from the available information on the practical application of these provisions, it appeared that in certain cases the expression of views of this kind had been held likely to be contrary to the interests of public safety or security.

(b) The Committee noted that, under the Law and Order (Maintenance) Act and the African Affairs Act, various authorities (the competent Minister, district commissioners, police officers, etc.) had extensive powers to restrict not only public, but also private meetings and gatherings and to prohibit individual persons from attending or addressing meetings or gatherings, subject to penalties involving an obligation to perform labour. The Southern Rhodesian Government stated that these provisions were designed for the maintenance of law and order and would not be used to prevent the expression of bona fide political views or views ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system. The Committee of Experts however observed that, as any prohibitions imposed by such administrative action on holding, attending or addressing meetings were of general scope, they would cover also peaceable political activity and, in the case of the last two prohibitions, the expression of any views. In so far as these prohibitions were enforced by penalties involving compulsory labour, they appeared to be incompatible with the Convention.

(c) The Committee noted that, under the Law and Order (Maintenance) Act and the African Affairs Act, the authorities might restrict the movement of particular persons and control the entry of persons into reserves or other tribal areas, subject to penalties involving an obligation to perform labour. It considered that these provisions also might lend themselves to application in a manner contrary to the Convention.

(d) The Committee noted that, under the Unlawful Organisations Act, organisations might be declared unlawful by the executive within wide discretionary powers whose exercise was expressly exempted from judicial review. The Committee noted further that, among the offences created in this connection (which were subject to penalties involving compulsory labour), some were defined in very wide terms. In these circumstances it considered that the Act lent itself to application in a manner contrary to the Convention.

(e) The Committee noted that the Law and Order (Maintenance) Act contained an extensive definition of subversion, which differed materially from the standard definition in the sedition laws of other United Kingdom territories, on which the earlier sedition laws of Southern Rhodesia had also been based. In the light of detailed information concerning the practical application of these provisions supplied by the Government in answer to a request from the Committee, the latter observed that they appeared in fact to have been applied to cases of incitement to violence. The Committee expressed the hope that the legislation might be amended to limit its application specifically to cases of this kind and thus avoid all possibility of its being used to punish the expression of political views or views ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system.

18. In its report for 1963-64 the Government of Southern Rhodesia set out in detail the considerations which, in its view, prevented the legislative provisions mentioned by the Committee of Experts from contravening the Convention. The Committee noted that in this report the Government in general expressed the belief that the Committee's observations were concerned with the possibility of the laws referred to being applied in breach of the Convention, and that it maintained that, whatever the possibilities of misapplication, they were in fact applied justly and in accordance with the spirit and letter of the Convention; the Government also indicated that it had been found impracticable to redraft the legislation in terms which would exclude all possibility of its being applied in breach of the Convention. The Committee pointed out that the legislative provisions referred to in its previous observations were of two kinds. On the one hand, there were provisions which, whatever the manner of their application, created liability to compulsory labour (that is, penal labour) in circumstances which fell within the Convention (e.g. prohibitions of all publications by particular persons or associations would cover the expression of all views, and general prohibitions to attend or address meetings or gatherings would cover even peaceable political activities). The second kind of provisions referred to by the Committee involved such extensive discretionary powers for the executive and administrative authorities or such extensive definitions of criminal offences that there existed not a mere possibility but a definite danger of their being applied in a manner contrary to the Convention (e.g. powers of the police to enter any premises, including private premises, at which three or more persons were gathered and to forbid persons from addressing the gathering, the banning of organisations by the executive under wide discretionary powers, and the extensive definition of offences under the Unlawful Organisations Act). Summarising the difficulties in the present case in ensuring the application of the Convention, the Committee observed that they arose—(a) from the approach adopted in the legislation of protecting security by general preventive measures by the executive or administrative authorities rather than by prescribing punishment for clearly defined offences against public order, (b) from the extensive definitions of various offences created by this legislation, and (c) from the fact that penalties through which the legislation was enforced involved an obligation to perform labour.

Forced Labour for Economic Purposes.

19. The Committee noted that, under the African Land Husbandry Act and the African Affairs Act, Africans might be called up for employment by the Government for up to 90 days a year on the conservation of natural resources or the promotion of good husbandry, and that, under the Natural Resources Acts, orders might be issued to Africans relating to the method of cultivation and utilisation of land or the crops to be grown thereon. In its report for 1961-63 the Southern Rhodesian Government indicated that the latter legislation had been amended so as to permit the issue of orders only for soil conservation measures by users or occupiers of any land, to the exclusion of directives as to crops and methods of cultivation. It also stated that the provisions of the African Land Husbandry Act and the African Affairs Act for the call-up of Natives were no longer used and that their repeal was contemplated. This information was noted with interest by the Committee of Experts in 1964. The Committee has also called for detailed information concerning the practical application of the Vagrancy Act.

Forced Labour as a Means of Labour Discipline.

20. The Committee noted that certain provisions of the African Labour Regulation Act, the Masters and Servants Act and the Africans (Registration and Identification) Act, in providing for the punishment of various breaches of contracts or discipline by employees with imprisonment (involving an obligation to perform labour), permitted forced or compulsory labour as a means of labour discipline. The Government of Southern Rhodesia indicated in its report for 1959-61 that it was examining the possibility of amending these provisions. In the last report received, for the period ending 30 June 1964, it stated that this matter was still under consideration.

Forced Labour as a Means of Discrimination.

21. The Committee noted that certain legislation permitted call-up for employment or the imposition of penalties involving an obligation to perform labour in respect of one group of the population, defined in terms of race, and thus appeared to permit a form of compulsory labour as a means of racial discrimination. Apart from some of the legislation mentioned in paragraph 19 above, the Committee referred to provisions concerning the registration, identification, control of movement, etc., of Africans in the Africans (Registration and Identification) Act and the African Affairs Act. The Southern Rhodesian Government stated in its report for the period ending 30 June 1964 that it was proposed to replace the former Act by legislation of general application to all races, and to repeal and replace the section of the African Affairs Act in question to clarify its scope and purpose.

Freedom of Association.

22. As noted above, while the general Conventions in the field of freedom of association have not been accepted on behalf of Southern Rhodesia, a declaration of application without modification of the Right of Association (Non-Metropolitan Territories) Convention, 1947 (No. 84), was made in 1950. This Convention came into force on 1 July 1953. The first report) on its application in Southern Rhodesia was received in 1956. It stated that, under customary law and practice, there was no restriction on the right of association for lawful purposes; the Industrial Conciliation Act, 1945, which provided for the registration of employers' organisations and workers' unions and established machinery for the settlement of industrial disputes, did not apply to African workers; a Bill to provide for the registration of African trade unions had been rejected by a Select Committee of the Southern Rhodesian Parliament, which had recommended the amendment of the Industrial Conciliation Act to provide for the inclusion of African workers and the formation and registration of non-racial trade unions and employers' organisations. The report also indicated that machinery for the regulation of wages and working conditions of African industrial workers and for the settlement of disputes affecting them was contained in the Native Labour Boards Act, 1947, as amended. In a report for 1956-57 it was stated that a Bill on the lines mentioned in the previous report was then before the Legislative Assembly, that no restriction was placed on the right of association for lawful purposes of African workers, that it was the Government's policy to encourage works committees and similar associations, and that the Native Labour Boards Act already made it unlawful for an employer to make employment of any Native dependent on his not being or becoming a member of a Native organisation representing Natives employed in any industry.

23. The Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations, from 1957 onwards, noted the proposed legislative changes.[1] In a direct request addressed to the Government in 1959 it also noted that the Industrial Conciliation Act, 1945, did not apply to agriculture and did not provide for appeals to the courts against a decision by the Chief Industrial Officer refusing or cancelling registration of an organisation, and inquired whether the new legislation would extend to agricultural workers and provide for such appeal to the courts.

24. A new, non-racial Industrial Conciliation Act (replacing the Act of 1945 and the Native Labour Boards Act) was adopted in 1959, and brought into effect on 1 January 1960. The Committee of Experts in 1961 noted with satisfaction that the new Act permitted the establishment and registration of multi-racial trade unions, as well as the establishment of multi-racial industrial councils. At the same time the Committee noted with regret that the Act did not apply to " persons in respect of their employment in farming operations (including forestry) or any domestic servants in private households ", and pointed out that the right to associate for all lawful purposes had, under the Convention, to be guaranteed to all employed persons.[2] In the Conference Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations the same year, a Government representative stated that the exclusion of certain categories of workers from the Industrial Conciliation Act did not mean that they were prohibited from forming trade unions; agricultural workers and domestic servants enjoyed the right of association under common law; their inclusion within the scope of the Industrial Conciliation Act would be further considered in the light of the Committee's observations.[3]

25. In a direct request addressed to the Government in 1961 the Committee of Experts took up two further points arising out of the 1959 Act. It noted that, in case of refusal by the Industrial Registrar to register a trade union or to approve an alteration of its constitution on the ground of public interest, an appeal could be made only to the Minister (whereas refusal on any other ground was subject to appeal to the Industrial Court). The Committee pointed out that the right of association could be effectively guaranteed only if there was a right of appeal to the courts. The Committee further noted that registration of a trade union might be refused if an existing trade union in the area was considered sufficiently representative of the interests concerned, and that registration of an existing trade union might be cancelled if the Registrar was satisfied that a newly established trade union which had applied for registration was more representative of the interests concerned. The Committee asked for information in all subsequent reports on recourse to these powers.

26. The Industrial Conciliation Act was amended in December 1964 so as to provide for an appeal to the Industrial Court against refusal or cancellation of registration of a trade union in all cases. This amendment was noted with satisfaction by the Committee of Experts.[1] As regards the powers to refuse registration where a sufficiently representative organisation already exists or to cancel registration in favour of a more representative union the Government stated in a report for 1960-62 that these powers had not been used in any case.

27. As regards the extension of the Industrial Conciliation Act to farm workers and domestic servants the Government of Southern Rhodesia stated in its report for 1962-64 that their inclusion in conciliation machinery " is a difficult problem which more advanced countries than Rhodesia have not solved and the Government has not been able, so far, to frame suitable amending legislation. The Government is, however, seeking information from countries outside Europe (such as Canada and the United States of America) as to their approach to the problem." In 1965 the Committee of Experts expressed its regret that, although the Act had been extensively amended in 1964, no measures had been taken to extend its scope to the above-mentioned categories of workers, and once more recalled that the Convention provides for the right to associate for all lawful purposes to be guaranteed to all employed persons.[1]

Complaints Alleging Violation of Trade Union Rights.

28. Apart from the examination by the supervisory bodies concerned of the application by Southern Rhodesia of the Right of Association (Non-Metropolitan Territories) Convention, 1947, five complaints alleging violations of trade union rights in Southern Rhodesia have been brought before the Governing Body Committee on Freedom of Association. The first two were communicated in March 1954 and January 1961 respectively by the World Federation of Trade Unions, the third was submitted in a series of communications between May and December 1962 by the Southern Rhodesia African Trades Union Congress and the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, the fourth was presented in March 1964 by the Southern Rhodesia African Trades Union Congress, and the fifth in a series of documents between September 1964 and April 1965 by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, the International Federation of Industrial Organisations and General Workers' Unions and the World Federation of Trade Unions. The first four complaints have been the subject of reports by the Committee on Freedom of Association, whose conclusions are summarised below. Examination of the fifth complaint (which relates to the detention or restriction, without trial, of a number of trade union leaders) is still pending, and no report on this case has yet been submitted by the Committee.

Complaint Submitted in 1954 by the World Federation of Trade Unions (Case No. 103).[2]

29. This complaint raised allegations in regard to the following matters:

(a) It was alleged that a strike in February 1954 had been declared illegal pursuant to the masters and servants laws. The Committee noted that under this legislation absence without leave rendered an employee liable to penal sanctions, with the effect of making illegal any strike by workers under contract. It indicated that certain restrictions on the right to strike in essential services might be legitimate, but drew attention to the importance of ensuring adequate guarantees in such cases to safeguard to the full the interests of the workers. The Committee noted that the strike in question had been called without warning before any attempt at settlement, and that the strikers appeared to have been neither prosecuted nor dismissed, but offered the choice between termination of their contracts or returning to work, and that the dispute had subsequently been settled. Certain incidental matters in connection with the same strike were not considered to call for further examination.

(b) The complaint called for measures to ensure to African workers the full right to organise in officially recognised trade unions and the right to put forward the legitimate demands of the workers and to bargain collectively. The Government indicated, in reply, that legislation had been introduced to make provision for the enrolment and registration of Native industrial workers' unions. The Committee noted that the proposed legislation appeared to guarantee the right of Native industrial workers to associate for all lawful purposes and that a union registered under it would have the function, inter alia, of negotiating with employers in regard to conditions of employment. The Committee, however, noted that under the Bill a union might be registered only where the Registrar was satisfied that no other union was enrolled for the same industry in the particular area, and drew attention to the fact that such a provision would be inconsistent with the principle that workers, without distinction whatsoever, should have the right freely to join organisations of their own choosing. As noted previously [1], the proposed legislation was not enacted; instead a new, non-racial Industrial Conciliation Act was adopted in 1959.

30. When the Committee on Freedom of Association first examined this complaint, it decided that several allegations did not call for further examination. On the other hand, it pursued the examination of allegations concerning the following three matters:

(a) Detention or restriction of movements of trade union leaders. It was alleged that, following the declaration of a state of emergency in Southern Rhodesia in February 1959, more than 30 trade union leaders had been detained, with the aim of crippling the trade unions, that about 20 of them were still in detention in January 1961, and that other trade union leaders were subject to restriction orders. The Government of Southern Rhodesia, in commenting on this allegation, declared that the detention of the persons concerned was due entirely to their subversive activities and not to the fact that they were trade union leaders. In April 1962 it was stated that no persons were then under detention, but that two of the persons named in the complaint were still subject to restriction orders. In March 1963 the Government stated that the last of these persons had been released from restriction, and the Committee thereupon decided not to pursue its examination of this aspect of the case.[3] In the course of examination of this allegation it drew attention to certain matters of principle, in particular that all detained persons should have the right to receive a fair trial at the earliest possible moment and that the restriction of a trade union officer's movements was inconsistent with the normal enjoyment of the right of association and with the exercise of the right to carry on trade union activities and functions and should, like actual detention, be accompanied by adequate judicial safeguards applied within a reasonable period.[4]

(b) Organising rights of agricultural workers, domestic servants, and government employees. This allegation related to the exclusion of the categories of workers concerned from the scope of the Industrial Conciliation Act, 1959. The Government of Southern Rhodesia, in commenting on the allegation, stated that agricultural and domestic servants were not debarred or prohibited by law from forming trade unions, that established civil servants could form their own employees' association, which was recognised by the Government for negotiating purposes, but could not form unions which registered under the 1959 Act, and that unestablished civil servants could belong to unions registered under the Act. The Committee on Freedom of Association has referred to the observations made by the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations on the exclusion of agricultural workers and domestic servants from the Industrial Conciliation Act [5], and has noted the considerable advantages of trade unions registered under the Act (corporate status, participation in industrial councils and in the statutory mediation and arbitration procedures, guaranteed protection against victimisation, immunities in respect of acts connected with lawful strikes, etc.). The Committee has accordingly drawn attention to the obligation assumed by the Government under Article 2 of the Right of Association (Non-Metropolitan Territories) Convention, 1947, to guarantee the right to associate for all lawful purposes to all employed persons.[1]

(c) Registration of trade unions under the Industrial Conciliation Act, 1959. The complaint raised two issues under this heading. One related to the fact that, in regard to certain decisions of the Industrial Registrar, an appeal lay to the Minister and not to the courts. This point had also been the subject of comment by the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations and, as noted above [2], found a satisfactory solution through the amendment of the Act in 1964. The other allegation related to the fact that, under the Act, registration of an organisation has to be refused unless the Registrar is satisfied, inter alia, that its constitution does not contain provisions which are contrary to any law or are calculated to hinder the attainment of the objects of any law or are not in the interests of the effective functioning of the trade union or employers' organisation concerned or are contrary to the public interest, and that the organisation is a responsible body and reasonably capable of taking part in the negotiation of matters of mutual interest between employer and employee in accordance with the provisions of that Act. The Committee on Freedom of Association has pointed out that, although an appeal lies to the courts against refusal of registration under these provisions, it is left to the Registrar to form his own judgment as to the fulfilment of the particular requirements mentioned in them. It has drawn attention to earlier observations by the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations that, in such cases, " the existence of a procedure of appeal to the courts does not appear to be a sufficient guarantee; in effect this does not alter the nature of the powers conferred on the authorities responsible for effecting registration, and the judges hearing such an appeal . . . would only be able to ensure that the legislation had been correctly applied ". It has accordingly recommended that the Industrial Conciliation Act be amended to define clearly the precise conditions which trade unions must fulfil to be entitled to registration and to prescribe specific statutory criteria for the purpose of deciding whether such conditions are fulfilled or not. Although the Act was the subject of extensive amendments in 1964, no action was taken with regard to this recommendation.[3]

Complaints by the Southern Rhodesia African Trades Union Congress and the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (Case No. 298).[4]

31. Some of the allegations made by the complaining organisations related to points already under examination in the previously mentioned case (namely, the exclusion of certain categories of workers from the Industrial Conciliation Act and the absence of a right of appeal to the courts against decisions of the Industrial Registrar in certain cases [5]), and the Committee did not therefore consider it necessary to go into them again. On its first examination of the case, the Committee also concluded that certain other allegations did not call for further examination. On the other hand, the Committee pursued its examination of the following matters:

(a) Restrictions on trade union activities under the Law and Order (Maintenance) Act and the Unlawful Organisations Act. It was alleged that these Acts were being used to suppress trade union activities. Reference was made to provisions concerning the prohibition of public processions, gatherings or meetings, the banning from or restriction to given areas of certain persons, penalties for incitement to strike in essential services, powers of the police to enter premises, the prohibition of certain publications, articles and statements, the recording of proceedings of public gatherings and the proscription of organisations. A specific allegation concerned the arrest of the General Secretary of the Southern Rhodesia African Trades Union Congress when addressing strikers. The Government of Southern Rhodesia, in commenting on these allegations, stated that the Acts in question were intended to preserve public order and were not directed against bona fide trade union activities; the trade union leader mentioned had been arrested because of subversive statements, and had been convicted by the courts of a charge relating to these statements. The Committee on Freedom of Association noted that this case was the only specific instance of the application of the legislation in question which had been cited in the complaints. It considered that the statement which had led to a conviction on a charge of subversion seemed clearly to go beyond what a trade union leader, like any other person, might make in a public address without incurring penal sanctions, and that the application of the legislation in question in this particular instance therefore did not constitute an infringement of trade union rights. It indicated, however, that this conclusion was without prejudice to the possibility of its having to take cognisance in future of allegations regarding the application of the security legislation in question to trade unions or their members.[1] Allegations of this nature have in fact been made in the fifth case concerning Southern Rhodesia now pending before the Committee on Freedom of Association.

(b) Restrictions on the right to hold trade union meetings. These allegations related to police control over trade union meetings. Following amendment of the relevant legislation—the Law and Order (Maintenance) Act—in 1963, and the receipt of the Southern Rhodesian Government's comments, the Committee noted that, in the case of meetings attended by less than 200 persons, it seemed that trade unions were not required to obtain prior authorisation, and that the power of the authorities to call for advance notification of the agenda of such meetings and the names of the intended speakers seemed to be a mere formality, since it did not imply that other matters might not be discussed or other persons allowed to speak. The Committee noted that meetings attended by more than 200 persons were automatically classified as public meetings, at which the police were empowered to be present and to record the proceedings. The Committee pointed out that the right of trade unions to hold meetings freely on their own premises, without the need for prior authorisation and without control by the public authorities, constituted a fundamental element in freedom of association and that the presence of police officers at trade union meetings might be considered as interference, from which the public authorities should refrain, with the right of trade unions to hold meetings in freedom. Lastly, the Committee noted that, on Sundays and holidays, only meetings held by unregistered trade unions were subject to supervision when attended by more than 200 persons, the Government having stated that the object of this provision was to encourage trade unions to apply for registration. The Committee observed that, while it was legitimate for registration in certain circumstances to involve advantages in regard to certain matters in the field of industrial relations, it should not in normal circumstances involve discrimination of such a character as to render non-registered organisations subject to special measures of police supervision which might restrict the exercise of freedom of association. The hope was accordingly expressed that the remaining restrictions on the holding of trade union meetings and the distinctions between registered and non-registered trade unions would soon be removed.[2]

(c) Incidents in a strike called in May 1962. It was alleged that, following a strike on 14 May 1962, the army and police maltreated the strikers, shooting occurred which caused several deaths and many casualties, and more than 3,000 strikers were dismissed from employment. The Government of Southern Rhodesia stated that a 24-hour general stoppage had been called as a warning shot for better wages for African workers, that when a prearranged pattern of intimidation and assault appeared the police were ordered to protect workers going to work, and that it became necessary to use force against those molesting returning workers and threatening life and property; this situation resulted in the death of two and the wounding of ten others. Dismissals had been decided by employers, who estimated that not more than 150 strikers had actually lost their employment, several workers already having been reinstated. The Committee noted that, according to the Government itself, the proclaimed reason for the strike was a warning for better wages for African workers, and the allegation could therefore not be dismissed on the ground that the strike was not in furtherance of a trade dispute. It recalled that, in cases in which the dispersal of public assemblies, etc., by the police, on grounds of public order or similar grounds, had involved loss of life, it had attached special importance to the circumstances being fully investigated by an immediate and independent special inquiry and to the regular legal procedure being followed to determine the justification and responsibility for the action taken by the police. It requested the Government to indicate whether such an inquiry had been instituted in the present case. The Government subsequently stated that magistrates had conducted inquests on the two persons killed, that verdicts of death due to gunshot wounds were brought in, and that the record of the inquests had been communicated to the Attorney-General, who had decided that no criminal proceedings should ensue. The Government, however, refused to comply with the Committee's request for copies of the records of the inquests.[1]

[1] See 70th Report, paras. 343-345.

(d) Preventive detention. These allegations related to the arrest, detention or restriction of eight officers of the Southern Rhodesia African Trades Union Congress. When they were considered by the Committee, none of these persons were subject to preventive detention or a restriction order; two of them were on bail pending appeal against convictions of having incited workers to continue an unlawful strike. The Committee was subsequently informed that on appeal the convictions and sentences had been set aside.[2]

Complaint by the Southern Rhodesia African Trades Union Congress (Case No. 380).[2]

32. This complaint arose out of a strike. The Committee noted that the strike appeared to have been called illegally (the workers not having first submitted their claim either to the management or to the appropriate industrial council), that police intervention had been due to acts of violence, and that an agreement appeared to have been concluded subsequently between the company and the workers concerned which met the latter's demands. The Committee, in these circumstances, considered it unnecessary to examine the case further.

Discrimination in Employment and Occupation.

33. As already noted, the Social Policy (Non-Metropolitan Territories) Convention, 1947, was accepted on behalf of Southern Rhodesia in 1950. Under Article 18 of this Convention it should be an aim of policy to abolish all discrimination among workers on grounds of race, colour, sex, belief, tribal association or trade union affiliation in respect of labour legislation and agreements; admission to employment; conditions of engagement and promotion; opportunities for vocational training; conditions of work; health, safety and welfare measures; discipline; participation in collective bargaining; and wage rates. No declaration has been made concerning the applicability to Southern Rhodesia of the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958, this Convention not having been ratified by the responsible member State, the United Kingdom. However, in 1962 reports on this Convention and the supplementary Recommendation were supplied in respect of Southern Rhodesia under article 19 of the I.L.O. Constitution (reports on unratified Conventions and on Recommendations). The information given with reference to the above-mentioned standards is summarised in the following paragraphs.

Application of the Non-Discrimination Provisions of the Social Policy (Non-Metropolitan Territories) Convention, 1947.

34. This Convention came into force in 1955. The first report on its application in Southern Rhodesia, for the period 1955-56, stated that it was an aim of policy to have no discrimination other than on grounds of sex. In answer to a request for more detailed information made by the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations the Government of Southern Rhodesia stated in its report for 1957-58 that there was no discrimination on grounds of belief, tribal association or trade union affiliation in respect of the matters mentioned in Article 18 of the Convention, that it remained an aim of policy to abolish all discrimination among workers on grounds of race, colour and sex, but that it was not practicable to draw up a programme of the measures it was proposed to take. As an indication of the advances being made, the report referred to the Bill to extend the Industrial Conciliation Act to Africans.[1] Discrimination in wage rates by reason of race, colour or sex was stated to be largely due to the production of work of less value; as the value of work increased, wages were advanced. The Committee of Experts, in a direct request addressed to the Government in 1959, noted this information and asked for further indications of the nature and extent of existing discrimination, in legislation or practice, and the measures contemplated to reduce or abolish such discrimination, even if no comprehensive programme could be established in this connection. Subsequent reports brought out the following developments:

(a) Elimination of racially discriminatory legislation. The Government of Southern Rhodesia reported the enactment in 1959 of a non-discriminatory Industrial Conciliation Act [2] and a non-racial Apprenticeship Act, and the amendment in 1960 of the Public Services Act to remove restrictions on the employment of non-Europeans in the public service. The Committee of Experts in 1960 also noted the adoption the previous year of a non-racial Workmen's Compensation Act in place of previous racially discriminatory legislation. The Government originally referred to difficulties in drafting non-racial labour legislation arising out of certain I.L.O. Conventions for the protection of indigenous workers, but—following certain explanations by the Committee of Experts—indicated in its report for 1959-60 that a non-racial General Employment Bill had been drafted.[3] In 1964 the Committee of Experts noted with regret that the Government's report for 1961-63 did not refer to this Bill, which was to repeal the Native Labour Regulations Act in accordance with the Government's stated policy of eliminating discrimination between the races from all legislation relating to workers.[4] In the report for the period ending 30 June 1965 the Government merely stated that the Bill was still under consideration.

(b) Practice. In answer to the Committee of Experts' request for more detailed information concerning the nature and extent of existing discrimination the Government of Southern Rhodesia in its report for 1958-59 gave the following indications concerning practice. It stated that, while there was no legislation which discriminated in the admission to private employment or as regards promotion, in many occupations Europeans were preferred. While there was no discrimination as regards vocational training opportunities, there were more training centres for Europeans than for non-Europeans; centres for the latter were, however, being increased. Africans received free medical treatment from government medical officers and in government hospitals, whereas non-Africans had to pay. Non-Africans received higher scales of public relief; but against this Africans had the advantage of many free services not available to Europeans.

(c) Education and training. The Southern Rhodesian Government had indicated in its earlier reports that free primary and secondary education was provided to all non-African children, attendance being compulsory from 7 to 15 years of age; for Africans education was not compulsory, but the number of schools and teachers was being increased. In its report for the period ending 30 June 1963 the Government stated that in the lower primary school (i.e. five years of education) 95.1 per cent. of African children of school-going age were then attending school. In the report for the period ending 30 June 1965, it was stated that the policy for African education was universal basic literacy (that is, five years' lower primary education) and, within the financial resources available, the expansion of facilities to permit a further three years' upper primary education. The report added that the time was not yet

[3] It may be noted that the implementation of the Conventions referred to has not proved an obstacle to the adoption of racially non-discriminatory legislation in various countries of the same region, for example Tanganyika (1955), Swaziland (1962), Bechuanaland (1963), Malawi (1964) and Basutoland (1964).

[4] See Report of the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations, 1964, op. cit., p. 178.

appropriate for prescribing a minimum school-leaving age for African children. As regards training, the report for 1959-61 stated that facilities for technical training of African apprentices were still in the early stages of development; there were facilities for training African apprentices in the building and motor industries, and it was hoped that in the near future facilities would be available in certain other industries. In the report for 1961-63 it was stated that facilities for training African apprentices were now identical to those for training European apprentices.

Reports on the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention and Recommendation, 1958.

35. These reports were received in December 1962. In the report on the Recommendation it was stated: "It is the Government's declared policy to abolish all forms of race discrimination, and the legislation required for this is receiving consideration." The report on the Convention referred to legislative action already taken in the field of employment and occupation—non-racial laws concerning industrial conciliation, apprenticeship and workmen's compensation, and the amendment in 1960 of the Public Services Act. The remaining racially discriminatory labour legislation (the Native Labour Regulations Act and the Native Juveniles Employment Act) was listed for total repeal in the General Employment Bill, which it was intended to introduce during the first session of Parliament in 1963. In 1961 the Federal Government and the Governments of Northern Rhodesia and Southern Rhodesia had issued a press statement that they had agreed in principle that courses in technical and commercial education should be open to students of all races, and since then this new policy had been implemented in Southern Rhodesia. The Native Affairs Act (though originally meant to provide special protection and assistance) would also be repealed in terms of the Government's declared policy of removing discriminatory legislation. The only form of discrimination existing to any appreciable extent in Southern Rhodesia was discrimination on the basis of sex. The Government intended to accept the Convention, with a modification as regards sex discrimination, as soon as the General Employment Bill had been passed by Parliament.[1] Since 1962 no further reports on the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention and Recommendation, 1958, have been called for under article 19 of the I.L.O. Constitution. As noted above, the General Employment Bill has not yet been enacted.

B. Standards of a Technical Nature.

36. The remaining standards which have been accepted in respect of Southern Rhodesia fall into three groups: two Conventions relating to indigenous workers, the provisions of the Social Policy (Non-Metropolitan Territories) Convention, 1947, other than those relating to the abolition of discrimination (which have already been considered), and two Conventions concerning labour inspection. The implementation of these standards is reviewed below.

Indigenous Workers.

37. The two Conventions accepted in respect of Southern Rhodesia are the Recruiting of Indigenous Workers Convention, 1936, and the Contracts of Employment (Indigenous Workers) Convention, 1947.[2] The first of these Conventions, which has been implemented through the African Labour Regulations Act and regulations issued under it, has not given rise to any comments by the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations. On the other hand, the Convention of 1947, which lays down the maximum periods of service which may be provided for in contracts of employment and which

[1] See Summary of Reports on Unratified Conventions and on Recommendations (Article 19 of the Constitution), Report III (Part II), International Labour Conference, 47th Session, Geneva, 1963 (Geneva, I.L.O., 1963), pp. 65-66.

[2] Although the United Kingdom has also ratified the Contracts of Employment (Indigenous Workers) Convention, 1939—providing for the administrative control of long-term contracts—and the Penal Sanctions (Indigenous Workers) Convention, 1939, neither has been the subject of any declaration concerning its applicability to Southern Rhodesia.

was accepted in respect of Southern Rhodesia in 1950, did give rise to observations from the time of the submission of the first report in 1954. This report indicated that the maximum period of written contracts, under the Masters and Servants Act, was three years (whereas under the Convention it is one, two or three years, depending on whether the contract involves a long and expensive journey and on whether the worker is accompanied by his family). The Government added that, under the Migrant Workers Act, migrant workers not accompanied by their families had to return to their country of origin every two years. It also stated that new legislation was proposed to implement the Convention more fully.[1] In 1958 a Government representative informed the Conference Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations that the General Employment Bill which it was proposed to submit to the Legislative Assembly at a suitable date would ensure the application of the various provisions of the Convention.[2] However, no progress was reported on this matter, and in 1963 the Committee of Experts noted that, on the contrary, the Migrant Workers' Act had been repealed in 1960.[3] In 1964 the Workers' and Employers' members of the Conference Committee expressed their concern at the undue delay in implementing the Convention and stated that, if the legislation was not brought into line with the Convention by the following year, Southern Rhodesia should be included in the list of cases of serious difficulties in implementing obligations under I.L.O. Conventions to which the Committee draws the special attention of the Conference in its report.[4] The Government's report for the period ending 30 June 1965 stated that legislation covering the requirements of the Convention had been passed by Parliament.[5]

Social Policy (Non-Metropolitan Territories) Convention, 1947.

38. Apart from the provisions providing for the abolition of discrimination, already considered [6], the Committee of Experts has commented on the application of provisions dealing with the protection of wages (Article 15) and provisions regarding the prescription of a school-leaving age and a minimum age for employment (Article 19). The former related to the issue of statements of wage payments to workers, for which, according to the Government, provision was to be made in the General Employment Bill. The differences between Europeans and non-Europeans in regard to compulsory education, and the Government's statements regarding its policies in this matter, have already been mentioned. As regards the minimum age for employment the Government has indicated, in answer to the Committee's comments, that under existing legislation no child under 12 years of age may be employed.

Labour Inspection.

39. As already noted, the Labour Inspectorates (Non-Metropolitan Territories) Convention, 1947, was accepted in respect of Southern Rhodesia in 1950, the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (though with certain modifications), in 1960. The matters which have been the subject of comments by the Committee of Experts are the following:

(a) With respect to the first-mentioned Convention the Committee noted that labour inspectors were not empowered to take samples (a point covered by a modification in respect of the corresponding requirement of the Labour Inspection Convention). In the latest report received in respect of the latter Convention, for the period ending 30 June 1965, it has been stated that legislation (the Factories and Works Amendment Act, 1965) had been passed to meet this requirement.

[5] The legislation in question is the Masters and Servants Amendment Act, No. 32 of 1965, which prescribes maximum periods for contracts of service corresponding to those provided for in the Convention.

(b) The Committee noted in a direct request addressed to the Government in 1961 that, under the African Labour Regulations Act, the duties of inspectors of African labourers included inquiries into all breaches of discipline and other minor contraventions of regulations by African labourers and the arrest of Africans reasonably suspected of contravening any regulations.[1] As these inspectors were considered to be labour inspectors within the Convention, the Committee observed that the duties mentioned were liable to interfere with the effective discharge of their primary duties. In reply the Government indicated in its report for the period ending 30 June 1961 that the above-mentioned duties had not been carried out by inspectors for more than 25 years, and that they had administrative instructions not to apply the provisions concerned; the latter would be repealed in the draft General Employment Bill.[4] In the report for the period ending 30 June 1965 the Government stated that the relevant provisions would be reviewed when the African Labour Regulations Act was next amended.

(c) The Committee has noted that, in addition to general labour inspectors, the Factories and Works Act empowers the competent Minister, with the approval of a local authority or an industrial council, to appoint a person employed by such authority or council as an inspector under the Act, but that such appointment may be summarily revoked at any time, whereas under Article 6 of the Convention inspection officials should be assured of stability of employment. In its report for 1961-63 the Government indicated that there were then no inspectors of the above kind. The Committee thereupon suggested that the particular provision for this type of appointment might be repealed.[3] The Government, in its report for the period ending 30 June 1965, stated that it was unable to agree to this suggestion.

CONCLUSION

40. Fourteen I.L.O. Conventions have been the subject of declarations of acceptance on behalf of Southern Rhodesia. Eight of these declarations have entered into force. The instruments so accepted include standards in the three main human rights fields within the competence of the I.L.O.: the two Conventions dealing with forced labour, the Convention dealing with the right of association in non-metropolitan territories, and the provisions for the abolition of discrimination in employment contained in the Convention on social policy in non-metropolitan territories. As regards the implementation of the standards concerned, the following conclusions emerge from the preceding review:

(a) As regards the Conventions on forced labour, certain changes were made in 1963 in legislation concerning the control of agriculture, to remove earlier powers which appeared to permit the imposition of compulsory cultivation on Africans, and the Government in 1964 stated its intention to repeal certain other provisions permitting the call-up of Africans for the purposes of conservation of natural resources and the promotion of good husbandry. However, the application of the Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957, has given rise to serious criticism by the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations, particularly as regards the effect of security legislation in imposing penalties involving compulsory labour as a means of political coercion or as a punishment for the expression of views, as regards the imposition of penal sanctions as a means of labour discipline, and as regards the application of certain restrictions and penalties on a racially discriminatory basis.

(b) In the field of freedom of association, an important step forward was taken in 1959 with the extension of the industrial conciliation legislation to workers of all races. In 1964 this legislation was further amended to take account of comments by I.L.O. supervisory bodies. However, a major limitation on the right to organise and to bargain collectively is constituted by the exclusion of agricultural workers and domestic servants from the Industrial Conciliation Act. Moreover, a considerable discretion is left to the Registrar in accepting the registration of an organisation, in the place of precise statutory criteria defining the conditions for registration. Various complaints brought before the Governing Body Committee on Freedom of Association have referred, in addition to these matters, to restrictions imposed under security legislation on trade union activities and to cases of detention or the restriction of movement of trade union leaders, without adequate judicial safeguards.

(c) As regards the elimination of discrimination, important legislative changes occurred in the period 1959-60, with the enactment of racially non-discriminatory industrial conciliation, apprenticeship and workmen's compensation legislation and the removal of restrictions on the employment of non-Europeans in the public services. The Government of Southern Rhodesia in 1962, in a report to the I.L.O., stated that its declared policy was to abolish all forms of race discrimination, and that the necessary legislation was receiving consideration. However, a General Employment Bill, which was intended to replace certain remaining racially discriminatory labour laws and to whose proposed enactment the Government referred as far back as 1957, has not yet been passed. Major distinctions between Europeans and Africans have also been noted as regards the educational system and facilities.

(d) As regards Conventions laying down standards of a technical nature, Acts adopted in 1965 were intended to meet long-standing deficiencies in the implementation of the Contracts of Employment (Indigenous Workers) Convention, 1947, and to extend the powers of labour inspectors in accordance with the relevant I.L.O. standards. However, several technical discrepancies remain as regards the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947, as also certain shortcomings in regard to the provisions of the Social Policy (Non-Metropolitan Territories) Convention, 1947 (particularly as regards the development of educational facilities and the prescription of a school-leaving age for Africans, apart from the further measures to eliminate discrimination from labour legislation mentioned earlier).

Part III. Technical Co-operation

41. Expert assistance to Southern Rhodesia has been limited to two missions in the field of social security. One of these was undertaken by an official of the Office from 16 February to 8 March 1964, the second by an expert recruited for the purpose from 26 November 1964 to 27 January 1965. The missions were financed by the Working Capital and Reserve Fund of the Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance in response to a request from the Southern Rhodesian Government through the United Kingdom Government. The first mission was of an exploratory nature and the second consisted of assistance in drafting the legislation, preparing the administrative organisation and procedures and assisting in the general preparation for the launching of the scheme.

42. Study grants have been awarded to enable five nominees of the Southern Rhodesian Government to participate, respectively, in seminars on co-operation in 1955 and 1963, a seminar on labour administration in 1962, and two training courses in labour administration in 1964. No fellowships have been granted to Southern Rhodesians.

43. Until the adoption by the Governing Body of its resolution on Southern Rhodesia in November 1965 the I.L.O. provided such technical assistance as the Southern Rhodesian Government had requested.

44. No project was in course of implementation when the Governing Body adopted its resolution on Southern Rhodesia in November 1965. Prior to the establishment of the illegal régime it had been intended to discuss with the appropriate Southern Rhodesian authorities a programme of technical assistance under the Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance for the 1967-68 biennium.

PART IV. DEVELOPMENTS CONCERNING SOUTHERN RHODESIA IN OTHER INTERNATIONAL ORGANISATIONS

I. United Nations

Action by the General Assembly.

45. Immediately after the unilateral declaration of independence, on 11 November 1965, the General Assembly adopted a resolution [1], by 107 votes to 2, with 1 abstention, by which it condemned the unilateral declaration of independence made by the racialist minority in Southern Rhodesia, invited the United Kingdom to implement immediately the relevant resolutions adopted by the General Assembly and the Security Council in order to put an end to the rebellion by the unlawful authority in Southern Rhodesia, and recommended the Security Council to consider this situation as a matter of urgency.

Condemnation of the Unilateral Declaration of Independence by the Security Council.

46. An urgent meeting of the Security Council to consider the situation in Southern Rhodesia was convened and met on 12 November 1965. The Council first agreed on the proposal that it should immediately take a preliminary measure in condemning the unilateral declaration of independence of Southern Rhodesia, and adopted, the same day, by 10 votes to none, with 1 abstention, the following resolution [2]:

The Security Council—

1. Decides to condemn the unilateral declaration of independence made by a racist minority in Southern Rhodesia;

2. Decides to call upon all States not to recognise this illegal racist minority régime in Southern Rhodesia and to refrain from rendering any assistance to this illegal régime.

There voted for the resolution: Bolivia, China, Ivory Coast, Jordan, Malaysia, Netherlands, the U.S.S.R., the United Kingdom, the United States and Uruguay. No negative vote was cast and France abstained.

Further Action by the Security Council.

47. Immediately after the adoption of the resolution condemning the unilateral declaration of independence, the Security Council returned to the consideration of measures designed to resolve the Southern Rhodesia question, and, in the course of seven sittings held between 12 and 20 November 1965, debated two draft resolutions submitted by the United Kingdom and the Ivory Coast respectively. The Council invited, at their request, the representatives of Algeria, India, Pakistan, Ghana, Zambia, Sierra Leone, Senegal, Mali, Tanzania, Nigeria, Guinea, Ethiopia, Mauritania, Gambia, Jamaica, Somalia and Sudan to take part, without the right to vote, in the discussion of the question, while South Africa and Portugal declined the Council's invitation to take part in the debate. The representatives of Bolivia and Uruguay put forward a draft resolution designed to reflect the various points of view expressed in the Council, which was adopted, on 20 November 1965, by 10 votes to none, with one abstention. There voted for the resolution: Bolivia, China, Ivory Coast, Jordan, Malaysia, Netherlands, the U.S.S.R., the United Kingdom, the United States and Uruguay. No negative vote was cast and France abstained.

48. The text of the resolution adopted by the Security Council [3] is as follows:

The Security Council,

Deeply concerned about the situation in Southern Rhodesia,

Considering that the illegal authorities in Southern Rhodesia have proclaimed independence and that the Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, as the administering Power, looks upon this as an act of rebellion,

---

[1] Resolution 2024 (XX).

[2] Resolution 216 (1965).

[3] Resolution 217 (1965).

Noting that the Government of the United Kingdom has taken certain measures to meet the situation and that to be effective these measures should correspond to the gravity of the situation,

1. Determines that the situation resulting from the proclamation of independence by the illegal authorities in Southern Rhodesia is extremely grave, that the Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland should put an end to it and that its continuance in time constitutes a threat to international peace and security;

2. Reaffirms its resolution 216 (1965) of 12 November 1965 and General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV) of 14 December 1960;

3. Condemns the usurpation of power by a racist settler minority in Southern Rhodesia and regards the declaration of independence by it as having no legal validity;

4. Calls upon the Government of the United Kingdom to quell this rebellion of the racist minority;

5. Further calls upon the Government of the United Kingdom to take all other appropriate measures which would prove effective in eliminating the authority of the usurpers and in bringing the minority régime in Southern Rhodesia to an immediate end;

6. Calls upon all States not to recognise this illegal authority and not to entertain any diplomatic or other relations with this illegal authority;

7. Calls upon the Government of the United Kingdom, as the working of the Constitution of 1961 has broken down, to take immediate measures in order to allow the people of Southern Rhodesia to determine their own future consistent with the objectives of General Assembly resolution 1514 (XV);

8. Calls upon all States to refrain from any action which would assist and encourage the illegal régime and, in particular, to desist from providing it with arms, equipment and military material, and to do their utmost in order to break all economic relations with Southern Rhodesia, including an embargo on oil and petroleum products;

9. Calls upon the Government of the United Kingdom to enforce urgently and with vigour all the measures it has announced, as well as those mentioned in paragraph 8 above;

10. Calls upon the Organisation of African Unity to do all in its power to assist in the implementation of the present resolution, in conformity with Chapter VIII of the Charter of the United Nations;

11. Decides to keep the question under review in order to examine what other measures it may deem necessary to take.

II. Specialised Agencies and International Atomic Energy Agency

Food and Agriculture Organisation of the United Nations.

49. An application for associate membership of Southern Rhodesia in the Food and Agriculture Organisation of the United Nations, submitted by the United Kingdom Government, was to have been acted upon by the 13th Session of the F.A.O. Conference, but, on 17 November 1965, the United Kingdom Government informed the Director-General of F.A.O. that in present circumstances the Government did not wish to proceed at the forthcoming 13th Session of the Conference with the application for associate membership for Southern Rhodesia. On 20 November 1965 the Director-General of F.A.O. circulated the communication of the United Kingdom Government as a Conference document. The Conference took no action on the application for associate membership for Southern Rhodesia.

United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organisation.

50. At the request of the United Kingdom Government, the Director-General of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organisation has made appropriate arrangements to suspend official communications with Southern Rhodesia.

World Health Organisation.

51. On 16 November 1965 the United Kingdom Government informed the Director-General of the World Health Organisation that the declaration purporting to declare Southern Rhodesia independent made by Mr. Smith on 11 November was an illegal act and ineffective in law, that Mr. Smith and the other Ministers in the former Southern Rhodesia Government had been dismissed, and that they were now private persons and could not legally exercise the functions of Government. It was further indicated that the United Kingdom Government had withdrawn the authority of the representatives of Southern Rhodesia who had been appointed by the former Government to represent Southern Rhodesia at W.H.O., to which Southern Rhodesia had been admitted as associate member. The communication also stated that no further communication should be held by W.H.O. with the illegal régime in Salisbury, and requested the Director-General to bring it to the attention of all member Governments without delay. On 29 November 1965 the Director-General of W.H.O. communicated, as requested, the letter of the United Kingdom Government to all Members and associate Members of W.H.O., and informed them that all official communications between W.H.O. and the territory had been suspended with effect from 11 November 1965.

International Bank for Reconstruction and Development.

52. The International Bank for Reconstruction and Development has special responsibilities arising from two important loans guaranteed by the United Kingdom and, for half each, by Southern Rhodesia and Zambia, to the Central African Power Corporation, which operates the Kariba Dam and the power station located on the Southern Rhodesian side of Lake Kariba. In these circumstances the Bank has a special concern with the present situation in regard to the installations and operations of the Central African Power Corporation, based on the Kariba Dam.

International Telecommunication Union.

53. The Secretary-General of the International Telecommunication Union has received from the United Kingdom Government a communication stating its position regarding the unilateral declaration of independence and indicating that no further communication should be held with the illegal régime in Salisbury, and this communication has been circulated to all members of I.T.U.

World Meteorological Organisation.

54. On 16 November 1965 the United Kingdom Government addressed a communication in terms similar to that sent to the Director-General of the World Health Organisation to the Secretary-General of the World Meteorological Organisation, of which Southern Rhodesia had become a Member under Article 3 (d) of the World Meteorological Convention, following a declaration by the United Kingdom Government providing for the application of the Convention to Southern Rhodesia. On 17 November 1965 the Secretary-General of W.M.O. circulated, as requested, the communication of the United Kingdom Government to the governments of all the Members of W.M.O. Communications intended for Southern Rhodesia are being forwarded to the United Kingdom Foreign Office in London.

III. United Nations Development Programme

55. In the course of the last session of the Technical Assistance Committee, the question of the application of the Security Council Resolution of 20 November 1965 to assistance to Southern Rhodesia within the framework of the Expanded Technical Programme of Assistance was raised, and the report of the Committee to the Economic and Social Council records satisfaction over the Executive Chairman's statement that no further action was to be taken on contingency authorisations for Southern Rhodesia, and that, since the passage of the Security Council Resolution, the participating organisations of E.P.T.A. and the executing agencies of the Special Fund had been requested to withdraw to Zambia all experts serving in Southern Rhodesia pending clarification of the political situation in Southern Rhodesia.

56. It is understood that all staff serving under both E.P.T.A. and the Special Fund have been withdrawn from Southern Rhodesia. There were no I.L.O. staff involved.

Part V. Further I.L.O. Action

57. The history of Southern Rhodesia's relations with the I.L.O. can be briefly recapitulated as follows.

58. From 1958 until 1963 Southern Rhodesia (as part of the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland) was represented in an observer delegation to the International Labour Conference and participated in the African Regional Conference and the African Advisory Committee. Southern Rhodesia was represented by an observer delegation at the 48th (1964) Session of the Conference. All of these arrangements had ceased to be operative prior to 11 November 1965.

59. The labour legislation of Southern Rhodesia corresponds on a number of points to international labour Conventions accepted by the United Kingdom on behalf of Southern Rhodesia.

60. The obligations accepted by the United Kingdom on behalf of Southern Rhodesia include obligations relating to freedom from forced labour, freedom of association, and freedom from discrimination in respect of employment and occupation, and obligations under Conventions of a more technical nature. They do not include the obligations of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948, the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949, or the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958.

61. At various stages positive steps have been taken, within the framework of the I.L.O. procedures relating to the application of Conventions on freedom of association, to give fuller effect to the obligations accepted. Of particular signification was the adoption in the period 1959-60 of a series of non-racial labour laws in pursuance of the declared policy of the Southern Rhodesia Government of that time to abolish all forms of racial discrimination. These laws remain in force.

62. In 1963 the Government of Southern Rhodesia informed the International Labour Office of its intention to accept the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958, with a modification under article 35 of the Constitution in respect of sex discrimination, as soon as a proposed General Employment Bill had been passed by Parliament, to adopt measures to give further effect to the provisions of the Convention, and to abolish all forms of race discrimination. This information was submitted to the International Labour Conference. No action has been taken to give effect to the intention then stated.

63. A number of important questions relating to the implementation of obligations under Conventions accepted by the United Kingdom on behalf of Southern Rhodesia, and recommendations made by the Governing Body in freedom of association cases, remain outstanding.

64. Southern Rhodesia has sought little technical co-operation from the I.L.O.; no I.L.O. technical co-operation project was in course of execution on 11 November 1965; discussions concerning a future programme which were in contemplation at that time have not now taken place.

65. It is in the light of this history that the Governing Body is now called upon to consider what further action by the I.L.O. would be helpful and appropriate.

66. The international aspect of the political problem of Southern Rhodesia is a matter for the United Nations. The Secretary-General of the United Nations was informed on 19 November 1965 of the decision taken on that day by the Governing Body that the International Labour Organisation will do everything in its power to contribute in its own sphere to such action as may be decided upon by the Security Council; the Security Council was so informed on the same day.

67. There are, nevertheless, aspects of the problem which fall clearly within the sphere of the I.L.O.

68. The Governing Body may now think it appropriate to draw the attention of the Government of the United Kingdom to the desirability of making provision in the settlement of the Rhodesian problem to ensure respect for the fundamental human rights embodied in I.L.O. standards, including in particular—

(a) the full implementation of the obligations accepted on behalf of Southern Rhodesia under the Forced Labour Convention, 1930, and the Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957, and more especially the elimination of forced or compulsory labour imposed as a means of political coercion or as a punishment for holding or expressing political or ideological views ;

(b) the full and free enjoyment by employers and workers of the right to associate, to organise and to bargain collectively, with due regard to the obligations in the matter already accepted on behalf of Southern Rhodesia and to the provisions of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948, and the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 ;

(c) the abolition of all forms of race discrimination in the field of employment and occupation with due regard to the obligations accepted on behalf of Southern Rhodesia under the Social Policy (Non-Metropolitan Territories) Convention, 1947, and to the provisions of the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958.

69. The Governing Body may also think it appropriate to place it on record that the I.L.O. will welcome the resumption of active participation by Southern Rhodesia in the work of the Organisation as soon as a constitutional government pledged to upholding basic human rights and freedoms embodied in I.L.O. standards has been established there.[1]

70. The Governing Body may likewise think it appropriate to place it on record that, as soon as a constitutional government pledged to upholding basic human rights and freedoms embodied in I.L.O. standards has been established in Southern Rhodesia, the I.L.O. will be prepared to give every assistance within its power in the training of Rhodesians of all races for the assumption of responsibilities in administration, industry and industrial relations, more particularly through the facilities of the International Institute for Labour Studies and the International Centre for Advanced Technical and Vocational Training and all other appropriate facilities which are or may be operated by the I.L.O. under the United Nations Development Programme.[1]

71. The Governing Body may wish the Director-General to report further developments in the situation to the Governing Body as may be appropriate.

Geneva, 9 February 1966.

[1] The Governing Body adopted the text of this paragraph on the understanding that the words " to upholding basic human rights and freedoms embodied in I.L.O. standards " would be replaced by " to the elimination of racial discrimination and to the upholding of other basic human rights and freedoms as embodied in I.L.O. standards ".

INFORMATION

50th Session of the International Labour Conference [1]

(Geneva, 1-22 June 1966)

The 50th Session of the General Conference of the International Labour Organisation was held at Geneva from 1 to 22 June 1966.

Composition and Agenda

One hundred and six of the 115 States Members of the Organisation were represented at the session, which was attended by 208 Government delegates, 102 Employers' delegates and 104 Workers' delegates, accompanied by 770 advisers. Sixty-three Ministers of Labour were among those attending or visiting the Conference. Observers were sent by one territory, and there were 158 representatives of intergovernmental and non-governmental international organisations. The proceedings of the Conference were followed by over 1,300 persons.

The agenda was as follows:

I. Report of the Director-General.
II. Financial and budgetary questions.
III. Information and reports on the application of Conventions and Recommendations.
IV. The role of co-operatives in the economic and social development of developing countries (second discussion).
V. Revision of Conventions Nos. 35, 36, 37, 38, 39 and 40 concerning old-age, invalidity and survivors' pensions (first discussion).
VI. Questions concerning fishermen (single discussion):
   (a) Accommodation on board fishing vessels;
   (b) Vocational training of fishermen;
   (c) Fishermen's certificates of competency.

[1] The texts of the instruments and resolutions adopted by the Conference appear in Supplement I to the present number.

In due course the International Labour Office will publish the Record of Proceedings of the 50th Session of the Conference. This will include the text of a communication addressed to the governments of member States concerning the agenda of the Conference and the memorandum appended thereto. It will contain lists of members of delegations, committees and Conference officers, the stenographic record of the discussions in plenary sitting, and appendices containing the reports of committees and the texts adopted by the Conference.

VII. Examination of grievances and communications within the undertaking (first discussion).

The Conference also had before it for information a report adopted by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office which dealt in particular with co-operation between the I.L.O. and the United Nations Organisation for Industrial Development with a view to the intensification of industrial development [1], and the second and third reports of the Working Party on the Programme and Structure of the I.L.O.

Election of President and Vice-Presidents and Establishment of Committees

After the Chairman of the Governing Body, Mr. Oumar Baba Diarra, had made the opening speech, the Conference elected as its President Mr. Leon Chajn (Government delegate, Poland). It also elected three Vice-Presidents: Mr. Roberto A. Billinghurst (Government delegate, Argentina) as Government Vice-President; Mr. Félix Martínez Espino (Employers' delegate, Venezuela) as Employers' Vice-President; and Mr. Mahmoud ben Ezzedine (Workers' delegate, Tunisia) as Workers' Vice-President.

The Conference set up a Selection Committee, which elected Mr. Henry Hauck (Government delegate, France) as its Chairman. This Committee made recommendations, which were approved by the Conference, on the composition of the Credentials Committee, Drafting Committee, Finance Committee of Government Representatives, Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations, and on the establishment of a Standing Orders Committee, a Resolutions Committee and a Committee on each of items IV to VII of the agenda.

The Conference then took note of the report of the board which deals with appeals from delegates against their non-inclusion in the voting membership of a Committee of the Conference. In accordance with the determinations of the Appeals Board the Employers' delegates of Bulgaria, Byelorussia, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Poland, Rumania, Ukraine, the U.S.S.R. and Yugoslavia were placed in the voting sections of various Committees.

Items on the Agenda

Report of the Director-General

A total of 209 speakers took part in the debate on the Director-General's Report concerning industrialisation and labour.

In his reply the Director-General, after reviewing the achievements of the Conference during its past 50 sessions, said that the gap separating the rich nations from the poor was a major threat to peace. Industrialisation was an important means of closing this gap; here the I.L.O. must play its part in ensuring that industrialisation was accompanied by a constructive social policy which protected the worker against exploitation, gave him the opportunity to achieve a decent standard of living, and guaranteed him certain basic rights. The I.L.O. had also its part to play in the economic field and in creating a social climate favourable to industrialisation. But industrialisation must be balanced by the modernisation of agriculture and the development of rural areas, for this was an indispensable basis for the development of industry. Appealing to Members to move beyond the political issues which divided them and to find common ground enabling them to co-operate for the betterment of mankind, the Director-General stressed the need to make the Organisation truly universal, encouraging diversity of opinion and interest, mutual respect and confidence, " consistent with the hopes of men and women everywhere for a new era and a new world, one where we have found the means and the will to resolve our problems without resort to war and its inevitable human misery and suffering ".

Financial and Budgetary Questions

The Conference voted the budget of the International Labour Organisation for 1967, amounting to $22,472,398.

The Conference also adopted a resolution concerning the proposed loan to finance the construction of the new headquarters building.[1]

Information and Reports on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations

The Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations examined the material submitted by governments and received supplementary information during the session form representatives of governments.

The Committee noted in its report that in the 40 years since its establishment by the Conference in 1926 ratifications had risen from about 200 to nearly 3,200 and the number of reports examined from 180 to some 3,000 annually.

With regard to the reports on ratified Conventions, 90 per cent. of the reports requested from governments had been received, and the number of reports received concerning non-metropolitan territories was 93.5 per cent. of those requested.

The Committee also discussed the conclusions of the Committee of independent experts on the reports supplied under article 19 of the Constitution in respect of the three instruments relating to labour inspection; it noted with satisfaction that the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947, had received 65 ratifications, a figure which placed this instrument among those having received the greatest response all over the world, and expressed the wish that those countries which had not yet ratified it should examine the possibility of doing so because the needs which the labour inspectorate should meet were absolutely essential. The Committee regretted that the Convention did not cover agriculture and insisted on the necessity of placing the question of labour inspection in agriculture on the agenda of a forthcoming session of the Conference with a view to adopting an international instrument.

The Conference took note of this report.[2]

The Role of Co-operatives in the Economic and Social Development of Developing Countries

The Committee on Co-operatives examined the text of a proposed Recommendation which had been prepared by the Office on the basis of conclusions adopted by the Conference at the close of the first discussion of the item at its 49th Session.

After adoption by the Committee, the proposed Recommendation concerning the role of co-operatives in the economic and social development of developing countries was placed before the Conference, which adopted it by 317 votes in favour, none against, with 6 abstentions. The Conference also adopted two resolutions on the same subject.

Revision of Conventions Nos. 35, 36, 37, 38, 39 and 40 concerning Old-Age, Invalidity and Survivors' Pensions

The Committee on Social Security had before it two reports prepared by the Office on the revision of Conventions Nos. 35, 36, 37, 38, 39 and 40. The Conference adopted the conclusions proposed by the Committee with a view to the adoption of a Convention supplemented by a Recommendation concerning the revision of Conventions Nos. 35, 36, 37, 38, 39 and 40 concerning old-age, invalidity and survivors' pensions and adopted without opposition or abstention a resolution concerning the placing on the agenda of the next ordinary session of the Conference of the question of the revision of Conventions Nos. 35, 36, 37, 38, 39 and 40 concerning old-age, invalidity and survivors' pensions.

Questions concerning Fishermen : (a) Accommodation on Board Fishing Vessels ; (b) Vocational Training of Fishermen ; (c) Fishermen's Certificates of Competency

The Committee on Fishermen had before it a report containing the record of the Preparatory Technical Conference on Fishermen's Questions and another report prepared by the Office containing the texts of three proposed instruments: a proposed Convention concerning accommodation on board fishing vessels, a proposed Recommendation concerning the training of fishermen, and a proposed Convention concerning fishermen's certificates of competency.

After their adoption by the Committee the three instruments were placed before the Conference, which adopted them as follows: Convention concerning fishermen's certificates of competency: adopted by 284 votes in favour, none against, with 14 abstentions; Convention concerning accommodation on board fishing vessels: 303 votes in favour, none against, with 16 abstentions; Recommendation concerning the vocational training of fishermen: 330 votes in favour, none against, with 6 abstentions. The Conference also adopted two resolutions, one concerning the Code of Practice on Safety on board Fishing Vessels, the other concerning the future work of the International Labour Organisation on fishermen's questions.

Examination of Grievances and Communications within the Undertaking

The Committee on Grievances and Communications had before it two reports prepared by the Office on the examination of grievances and communications within the undertaking. The Conference adopted the conclusions proposed by the Committee with a view to the preparation of two instruments: a Recommendation concerning examination of grievances within the undertaking with a view to their settlement, and a Recommendation concerning communications within the undertaking; it also adopted a resolution concerning the placing on the agenda of the next ordinary session of the Conference of the question of examination of grievances and communications within the undertaking.

Other Matters

Resolutions

Twelve resolutions had been submitted to the Conference in accordance with article 17 of the Standing Orders. The resolution concerning the future work of the International Labour Organisation on fishermen's questions was referred to the Committee on Fishermen, and the texts of two resolutions concerning the industrialisation of developing countries were amalgamated to form a single resolution. Of the ten resolutions which thus remained, the Resolutions Committee determined by secret ballot which five should be considered first, and in what order, and six resolutions were finally submitted to the Conference and adopted by it. They dealt with the following questions: the role of the International Labour Organisation in the industrialisation of developing countries; the contribution of the International Labour Organisation to the International Human Rights Year in 1968; the development of human resources; national labour departments and other public institutions responsible for the administration of labour matters; special youth training and employment programmes; and workers' participation in undertakings.

Second Special Report of the Director-General on the Application of the Declaration concerning the Policy of "Apartheid" of the Republic of South Africa

The Conference took note of the Second Special Report of the Director-General on the Application of the Declaration concerning the Policy of "Apartheid " of the Republic of South Africa.

AGENDA OF THE 52ND (1968) SESSSION OF THE INTERNATIONAL LABOUR CONFERENCE

The Governing Body gave preliminary consideration to the agenda of the 52nd (1968) Session of the International Labour Conference. With a view to final determination of the agenda it decided that at its 167th Session it should receive law and practice reports or more detailed proposals on the following subjects:

(a) holidays with pay;
(b) labour inspection in agriculture;
(c) revision of Conventions Nos. 24 and 25 concerning sickness insurance; and
(d) minimum wage-fixing machinery and related problems, with special reference to developing countries.

Note was taken of a suggestion that a study on the law and practice in regard to social security in developing countries, and possible I.L.O. instruments on the subject, should also be submitted to the Governing Body.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE OF EXPERTS ON THE APPLICATION OF CONVENTIONS AND RECOMMENDATIONS

(36th Session, Geneva, 14-25 March 1966)

The Governing Body took note of the report of the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations on its 36th Session (Geneva, 14-25 March 1966) [1], and of the special report on the measures taken by the Government of Portugal to give effect to the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry appointed under article 26 of the Constitution to examine the observance by Portugal of the Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105).[2]

Report of the Meeting of Experts on the Outline and Content of the Encyclopaedia of Occupational Health and Safety

(Geneva, 18-26 April 1966)

The Meeting of Experts on the Outline and Content of the Encyclopaedia of Occupational Health and Safety was held in Geneva from 18 to 26 April 1966.[3] The Governing Body took note of the report of the Meeting and invited the Director-General to take account of the experts' views in preparing the Encyclopaedia.

Reports of the Committee on Freedom of Association

At its first sitting the Governing Body examined the reports of its Committee on Freedom of Association.

Eighty-ninth Report [4]

The Governing Body had before it the 89th Report of its Committee on Freedom of Association and adopted the recommendations contained therein.

Ninetieth Report [4]

The Governing Body also had before it the 90th Report of its Committee on Freedom of Association. It adopted the recommendations contained therein.

Ninety-first Report [4]

The Governing Body further examined the 91st Report of the Committee and adopted the recommendations contained therein.

Ninety-second Report [4]

The Governing Body decided to examine the 92nd Report of the Committee on Freedom of Association at its 166th Session.

Reports of the Financial and Administrative Committee

The Governing Body took the following action on the reports of its Financial and Administrative Committee.

It recommended the Conference to adopt the Audited Accounts for 1965 and appointed Mr. Lars Breie (Norway) as Auditor to the International Labour Organisation for a period of one year from 1 April 1967.

With respect to the plan for the new headquarters building [5] the Governing Body approved the financing of extra expenditure in connection with the study of over-all plans for the building, and took note of the progress report on the study of over-all plans by the team of architects. In accordance with the recommendations submitted by the Building Subcommittee to the Financial and Administrative Committee, the Governing Body approved the contract with the Property Foundation for International Organisations, on the understanding that the contract would come into effect after the Conference had adopted a resolution authorising the Director-General to contract the loan required to finance the construction of the new building, that the Swiss constitutional procedures had been completed and that the Governing Body had approved the over-all plan and related cost estimates for the new building It decided to recommend to the International Labour Conference at its 50th Session the adoption of a resolution [1] designed to give effect to these decisions. The Governing Body also approved an addition to the membership of the Advisory Committee of Architects.

The Governing Body took action on various questions affecting serving and retired officials. It decided to submit to the Conference a resolution concerning the contributions payable to the I.L.O. Staff Pensions Fund for 1967. It approved proposals regarding an increase in pensions payable by the Fund and recommended to the Conference that, in order to give effect to these proposals, the Regulations of the I.L.O. Staff Pensions Fund should be amended with effect from 1 March 1965. The Governing Body also decided to submit to the Conference for adoption a resolution providing for upward adjustments of the pensions payable by the Pensions Fund of the Judges of the former Permanent Court of International Justice.

In connection with a proposal concerning the appointment of a Governing Body delegation to attend the Economic and Social Council [2], the Governing Body took steps to cover the expenditure which would be incurred if it should decide to appoint a delegation to accompany the Director-General to the Economic and Social Council in Geneva in July 1966, the amount of the charge thus authorised to be confirmed by the Governing Body at its 167th Session (November 1966).

Lastly, the Governing Body took note of the information contained in the reports of the Financial and Administrative Committee.

Reports of the Allocations Committee

In accordance with the recommendation of its Allocations Committee the Governing Body at its second sitting, held on 28 May 1966, authorised the Allocations Committee to continue its work if necessary after the meetings of the Governing Body on that date and to submit its reports direct to the Finance Committee of Government Representatives of the Conference.

The Governing Body decided to recommend to the International Labour Conference at its 50th Session the approval of the scale of assessment of contributions of member States for 1967, subject to such adjustments as might be necessary following the assessment of new member States.

Report of the International Organisations Committee

Recent Developments in the Field of Industrialisation

At its 164th Session the Governing Body, having been informed of the establishment of a United Nations Organisation for Industrial Development (U.N.O.I.D.), had taken a number of decisions concerning industrial development.[2] At its present session the Governing Body had before it the report of its International Organisations Committee on recent developments in this field. After a long debate, it decided, by 37 votes to 4, with 2 abstentions—

(a) to confirm the decision of the I.L.O. to maintain and expand its assistance to developing countries in the training of staff needed for their accelerated industrial development, including skilled workers, technicians and management personnel, and its special competence and experience in the matter by reason of its tripartite structure;

(b) to welcome the intensification of activities to promote the industrialisation of developing countries to which U.N.O.I.D. should make an important contribution;

(c) to reaffirm the views expressed at the 162nd and 164th Sessions of the Governing Body that the resources and experience of the I.L.O. should be fully utilised in the United Nations Programme for Industrial Development; to endorse the view of the Administrative Committee on Co-ordination (A.C.C.), expressed in its 31st and 32nd Reports, that wasteful duplication and overlapping between agencies of the United Nations system must be avoided to assure an effective, co-ordinated United Nations programme of action for the promotion and acceleration of industrial development and to note its proposal that further consultations should take place with a view to agreement being reached on a generally acceptable formula;

(d) to invite the Director-General to continue to pursue with the Secretary-General of the United Nations and A.C.C. the development of arrangements under which the above objectives could be achieved on the basis of the equal status of the participating organisations;

(e) to consider at its 166th Session [1] the appointment of a tripartite Governing Body delegation to accompany the Director-General to the Economic and Social Council and the General Assembly as might be required [2]; and

(f) to communicate the report of the International Organisations Committee to the members of the Conference for information.

Report of the Committee on Industrial Committees

The Governing Body had before it the report of its Committee on Industrial Committees, on the basis of which it took the following decisions.

Formula Used in Communicating to Member States Conclusions and Resolutions of Industrial and Analogous Committees and Similar Meetings

The Governing Body decided that henceforth, in communicating to member States the reports, conclusions and resolutions of Industrial and analogous Committees and of similar meetings, the following practice should be observed:

(1) when, after consideration has been given by the Governing Body to the reports, conclusions and resolutions, a decision is taken to authorise their transmission to governments, the letter of transmittal should state that " the Governing Body has taken note of these documents " (instead of stating that " the Governing Body has not expressed any opinion on the contents thereof ", in accordance with the formula adopted by the Governing Body at its 127th Session (Rome, November 1954) [3];

[3] See Official Bulletin, Vol. XXXVII, No. 7, 31 Dec. 1954, p. 307.

(2) when a decision is taken at a particular session of the Governing Body to authorise the immediate transmission of the reports, conclusions and resolutions to governments, but to postpone until a later session of the Governing Body the consideration of the texts in question, it should be made clear, in transmitting them to governments, that " the Governing Body has not yet given consideration to these documents ".

Metal Trades Committee : Effect to Be Given to the Conclusions of the Eighth Session

The Governing Body authorised the Director-General to communicate the reports, conclusions and resolutions adopted by the Metal Trades Committee at its Eighth Session (Geneva, 6-17 December 1965) to governments, drawing their special attention to the report and conclusions (No. 63) concerning international co-operation in dealing with manpower, social and labour problems in the metal trades in developing countries [1] and the report and conclusions (No. 64) concerning the role of employers' and workers' organisations in programming and planning in the metal trades [2], informing them that the Governing Body has taken note of these documents and inviting them to transmit them to the employers' and workers' organisations concerned.

International Co-operation.

The Governing Body requested the Director-General to take account of the views expressed by the Metal Trades Committee in paragraphs 29 to 38 of conclusions No. 63 [3] when drawing up the over-all programme of work of the Office, and to ensure that effect was given to the suggestions made by the Metal Trades Committee in paragraph 41 of conclusions No. 63.[4]

Effect Given to the Conclusions and Resolutions Adopted by the Metal Trades Committee at Its Previous Sessions.

The Governing Body requested the Director-General—

(a) to study all aspects, including the financial aspects, of the measures which he might recommend with a view to improving the facilities provided in Spanish and German, in accordance with the resolution (No. 54) concerning the use of German and Spanish at sessions of the Committee [5]; and

(b) to submit a report on this matter to the Governing Body as soon as possible.

The Director-General was requested to take account of the requests made by the Metal Trades Committee at its Seventh Session (Geneva, 17-28 September 1962) in the conclusions (No. 56) concerning working conditions and safety in shipbuilding and ship repairing [6] and in the resolution (No. 57) concerning tripartite action regarding vocational training in the metal trades [7] when drawing up the work programme for 1968.

The Governing Body authorised the Director-General to give effect to the requests of the Committee that the Office should take appropriate measures to ensure that the Reduction in Hours of Work.

The Director-General was authorised to give effect to the requests mentioned in the resolution (No. 65) concerning a reduction in hours of work without reduction of income in the metal trades.[2]

Women Workers in the Metal Trades.

The Governing Body requested the Director-General to give effect to the requests made by the Metal Trades Committee in the resolution (No. 66) concerning women workers in the metal trades.[3]

Labour Statistics in the Metal Trades.

The Director-General was authorised to give effect to the requests made by the Metal Trades Committee in clauses (a) and (b) of the resolution (No. 67) concerning labour statistics in the metal trades.[4]

The Governing Body authorised the Director-General to bring the request expressed by the Metal Trades Committee in clause (c) of resolution No. 67 [5] to the attention of the Eleventh International Conference of Labour Statisticians together with a summary of the views expressed concerning this request during the discussion in the Committee on Industrial Committees.

Freedom of Association and Trade Union Rights in the Metal Trades.

The Governing Body requested the Director-General to draw the attention of governments, and through them that of the employers' and workers' organisations concerned, to the proposals made by the Metal Trades Committee in the resolution (No. 68) concerning freedom of association and trade union rights in the metal trades.[5]

Future I.L.O. Action relating to the Metal Trades.

The Director-General was authorised to take account of the requests made by the Metal Trades Committee in the resolution (No. 69) concerning future action of the International Labour Organisation relating to the metal trades [6] when drawing up the work programmes of the Office for future years.

REPORT OF THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL

Obituary

The Governing Body asked the Director-General to convey its sympathy to the family of the late Mr. W. Schevenels, formerly Secretary of the Workers' group of the Governing Body and Workers' substitute deputy member, and to the family of Mr. Wit Hanke, formerly a Workers' member of the Governing Body and Polish Workers' delegate to the International Labour Conference.

[1] The Governing Body also had before it, for information, the budget of the Centre for 1966, under the agenda item relating to the reports of its Financial and Administrative Committee.

Progress of International Labour Legislation

Internal Administration

Publications

The Governing Body took note of the information contained in these sections of the report.

Interpretation of Decisions of the International Labour Conference

The Governing Body took note of the information submitted by the Director-General under this heading.[1]

Participation of Asian Countries of the Near and Middle East in the Asian Regional Activities of the International Labour Organisation

The Governing Body noted that the report was withdrawn pending the further consultations which the Director-General intended to hold.

Proposals concerning the Composition of the Asian Advisory Committee

The Governing Body decided that the Asian Advisory Committee [2] should be reconstituted, that it should consist of 24 members (12 representing Governments, six representing Employers and six representing Workers) and that it should comprise—

(a) automatic or ex officio members, consisting of the Government, Employers' and Workers' members and deputy members of the Governing Body who are nationals of one of the member States falling within the area;

(b) members elected by the International Labour Conference to complete with the ex officio members a total of ten Government, five Employers' and five Workers' members. Those eligible for election would be, in the case of governments, the member States of the Organisation belonging to the area and, in the case of employers and workers, nationals of those States; the electoral colleges would consist of the delegates of the member States entitled to attend the Asian Regional Conference;

(c) four members (two Government, one Employers' and one Workers') to be nominated by the Governing Body from countries entitled to attend the Asian Regional Conference. If the total number of members drawn from States Members of the Organisation under (a) and (b) fell short of 20, the number required to complete this figure would be nominated from among such members under this clause.

Organisation of the Work of the Governing Body

The Governing Body postponed consideration of the matters raised under this heading.

NINETY-SECOND REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON FREEDOM OF ASSOCIATION [1]

The Governing Body examined the 92nd Report of its Committee on Freedom of Association and adopted the recommendations contained therein.

COMPOSITION AND AGENDA OF COMMITTEES AND OF VARIOUS MEETINGS

Committee of Social Security Experts

At previous sessions the Governing Body had approved the appointment of experts to renew the membership of the Committee of Social Security Experts.[2] At the present session, it approved the appointment of the following experts on social security in general as members of the Committee of Social Security Experts for a period expiring on 31 December 1968:

Expert nominated after consultation with Governments :

Mr. F. ROSELLI (Italy), Director-General for Social Welfare and Social Assistance, Ministry of Labour and Social Welfare, Rome.[3]

Experts nominated after consultation with the Workers' group of the Governing Body :

Mr. N. CRUIKSHANK (United States), former Director, A.F.L.-C.I.O. Social Security Department, Washington.
Mr. B. HEISE (Federal Republic of Germany), Chief of the Executive Board, German Confederation of Trade Unions.[4]

Agenda of the Third Session of the African Advisory Committee

At its 152nd Session (June 1962) the Governing Body had placed two questions on the agenda of the Third Session of the African Advisory Committee and had

[3] Appointment to fill the vacancy created by the death of Mr. G. Carapezza (Italy), Director-General of Pensions and Social Assistance, Ministry of Labour, Rome, who was appointed to the Committee by the Governing Body at its 163rd Session.

[4] Appointed to replace Mr. Kanev (Israel), Chairman, Health Insurance Institution, Kupat Holim, Tel Aviv, who, in view of his appointment as a Government expert on social security in general, is not in a position to go on serving in the Committee as a Workers' expert.

authorised the Director-General to submit to it in due course proposals concerning a third question.[1] At its present session it fixed the agenda of the Third Session of the Committee as follows:

I. Labour administration, including labour inspection, in Africa.

II. Evaluation and prospects of technical assistance in Africa.

III. Employment policy in Africa.

It was understood that the question of the determination of the minimum subsistence level, including the establishment of standard family budgets, would be dealt with within the framework of item III.

Proposals concerning a Meeting of Experts on the Safe Use of Benzene and Benzenic Solvents

The budget adopted by the International Labour Conference at its 50th Session (June 1966) contains provision for a Meeting of Experts on the Safe Use of Benzene and Benzenic Solvents. The Governing Body approved the following agenda for the Meeting [2]:

I. Composition, preparation and industrial use of substances containing benzene or its homologues.

II. Occupational hazards and examination of whether it is possible to determine acceptable levels of exposure.

III. Technical safety measures and substitution.

IV. Medical control and health education.

The Governing Body decided that the Meeting should consist of 12 experts. It noted that the Director-General intended to submit to the Governing Body at its 167th Session proposals concerning the experts to be invited to attend the Meeting, having regard to those countries in which the substances in question are most widely used, and that at least two of these nominations would be made following consultations with the Employers' group and at least two following consultations with the Workers' group of the Governing Body.

The Director-General will invite the World Health Organisation, the Council of Europe, the European Economic Community and the International Social Security Association to be represented at the Meeting.

The Director-General was authorised to invite the following non-governmental international organisations to send observers to the Meeting:

International Union of Pure and Applied Chemistry.

Permanent Commission and International Association on Occupational Health.

Report of the Director-General

Preliminary Proposals concerning the Celebration of the 50th Anniversary of the International Labour Organisation

The year 1969 will mark the 50th anniversary of the International Labour Organisation. The Governing Body had before it preliminary proposals concerning the celebration of this anniversary, in the light of which it took the following action.

[1] See Official Bulletin, Vol. XLV, No. 3, July 1962, p. 173.

[2] For the date and place of this Meeting see below p. 286.

It decided to appoint from among its members a tripartite committee, to be called the " Fiftieth Anniversary Committee ", to study and recommend appropriate measures with a view to the 50th anniversary celebration, it being understood that the Committee would probably be appointed by the Governing Body at its 167th Session.

The Governing Body further authorised the Director-General—

(a) to request member States to consider the issue of commemorative stamps in 1969 on the occasion of the 50th anniversary of the I.L.O.; and

(b) to inform the Director of the Universal Postal Union of the measures taken and to request him to bring the matter to the attention of postal administrations.

Questions Arising out of the 50th (1966) Session of the International Labour Conference

Resolution concerning the Role of the International Labour Organisation in the Industrialisation of Developing Countries

At its 50th Session (June 1966) the International Labour Conference adopted a resolution concerning the role of the International Labour Organisation in the industrialisation of developing countries.[1] The Governing Body was called upon, at its present session, to take immediate steps with respect to this resolution.

The Governing Body authorised the Director-General—

(a) to communicate the resolution to the governments of member States, asking them to transmit it to employers' and workers' organisations and requesting them to make available to him, not later than 1 November 1966, information on the work programmes which they consider it appropriate for the I.L.O. to undertake with respect to the social, labour and vocational training problems raised by industrialisation, in co-ordination with the programmes of the United Nations Organisation for Industrial Development (U.N.O.I.D.);

(b) to submit to the Governing Body, for discussion at its session to be held in February-March 1967, plans drawn up on the basis of the various factors mentioned in clause (c) of paragraph 3 of the resolution with a view to adapting and intensifying the activities of the I.L.O. relating to the industrialisation of the developing countries, these plans to be submitted, after discussion by the Governing Body, to the 51st (1967) Session of the International Labour Conference for consideration and decision under the eighth item on its agenda, namely " the International Labour Organisation and technical co-operation ";

(c) to take all appropriate steps to ensure that the I.L.O. co-operates with U.N.O.I.D., within the field of competence of the International Labour Organisation, in connection with the industrial development of the developing countries; and

(d) to communicate the resolution to the Secretary-General of the United Nations and to the executive heads of the agencies within the United Nations system.

Meeting of Experts on the Outline and Content of the Encyclopaedia of Occupational Health and Safety

(Geneva, 18-26 April 1966)

Between 1930 and 1934 the I.L.O. published the encyclopaedia Occupation and Health, which was intended to provide those interested in the protection of the health of workers at their workplaces with a summary of the knowledge available on this subject. The encyclopaedia was well received and it was regarded as a most useful work of reference. Since then, however, knowledge in this field has developed, and parts of the encyclopaedia are now out of date.

In 1950 the special Committee set up by the Governing Body to study the programme of work of the Office in the field of industrial safety and health recommended that it should be brought up to date, and two panels of the Correspondence Committee on Occupational Safety and Health expressed the hope that the new edition would include articles on the main aspects of safety.

In November 1965 the Governing Body authorised the Director-General to undertake the preparation of a new edition of the encyclopaedia and to convene a meeting of experts to consider the outline and content of this work. The meeting was held at Geneva from 18 to 26 April 1966. It was made up of 15 experts, some of whom had been appointed in consultation with the Employers' and Workers' groups of the Governing Body. They came from the following countries: Brazil, Canada, France, Federal Republic of Germany, India, Italy, Mexico, Poland, Senegal, Sweden, Switzerland, U.S.S.R., United Arab Republic, United Kingdom and United States. The World Health Organisation, the High Authority of the European Coal and Steel Community and the European Economic Community were represented. The Permanent Commission and International Association on Occupational Health and the International Social Security Association sent observers. Professor H. DESOILLE was elected Chairman. Professors G. NOFER and A. M. EL KADEEM were appointed reporters.

The agenda of the Meeting, as approved by the Governing Body at its 163rd Session (November 1965) was as follows:

I. Determination of the list of articles.

II. Internal arrangement of the articles.

III. Criteria for the preparation of the articles.

IV. Other questions.

The Meeting had before it various working papers prepared by the Office, including one containing drafts of cards for about 950 articles. These papers were examined in detail by the Meeting, which made the necessary modifications and gave general instructions on the distribution, internal arrangement and length of the articles. It also recommended that the Office should be empowered to make such modifications and adaptations as it considered necessary to the contributions of the various authors with a view to harmonising the presentation of the articles, avoiding repetitions and making good any omissions.

Committee on Work on Plantations

(Fifth Session, Geneva, 2-13 May 1966)

The Fifth Session [1] of the Committee on Work on Plantations of the International Labour Organisation was held at the International Labour Office, Geneva, from 2 to 13 May 1966.

The agenda of the session, which had been fixed by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office at its 160th Session (November 1964), was as follows:

I. General Report, dealing particularly with—
   (a) action taken in the various countries in the light of the conclusions adopted at previous sessions of the Committee;
   (b) steps taken by the Office to follow up the studies and inquiries proposed by the Committee; and
   (c) recent events and developments in work on plantations.

II. Practical measures to promote good labour-management relations on plantations, with particular reference to—
   (a) recruitment and engagement of workers;
   (b) joint consultation; and
   (c) grievance procedures.

III. Labour inspection on plantations.

The International Labour Office had prepared a report on each of the above items.

In accordance with the decision of the Governing Body the Chairman of the Fifth Session was Mr. A. D. WILSON Jr., representative of the Government of the Republic of Liberia on the Governing Body. Mr. J. A. T. PERERA (Malaysia) represented the Employers' group of the Governing Body. Mr. F. AHMAD, who was appointed to represent the Workers' group of the Governing Body, was unable to attend owing to ill health.

The Committee elected two Vice-Chairmen: Mr. KONIAN KODJO (Ivory Coast) for the Employers' group and Mr. S. P. S. NATHAN (Malaysia) for the Workers' group.

The following 22 countries which are members of the Committee on Work on Plantations were represented at the Fifth Session:

Argentina	Ecuador	Mexico
Brazil	France	Pakistan
Cameroon	India	Peru
Central African Republic	Israel	Philippines
Ceylon	Ivory Coast	Tanzania
China	Kenya	Uganda
Costa Rica	Malaysia	United Arab Republic
Cuba

Burma, which is also a member of the Committee, was not able to send a delegation to attend the Fifth Session. Jamaica was represented at the meeting by an observer.

Representatives of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development and the League of Arab States attended the session.

In addition, observers of the following non-governmental international organisations were present at the session:

International Confederation of Free Trade Unions.[1]

International Federation of Christian Trade Unions.[1]

International Federation of Plantation, Agricultural and Allied Workers.

International Union of Food and Allied Workers.

International Organisation of Employers.[1]

Organisation of Employers' Federations and Employers in Developing Countries.

World Federation of Trade Unions.[1]

The Committee was divided into two subcommittees for the examination of the two technical items on its agenda: a subcommittee on labour-management relations and a subcommittee on labour inspection on plantations. The Committee also set up a Steering Committee and a working party to consider the effect given to the conclusions and resolutions adopted by the Committee on Work on Plantations at its previous sessions.

The Committee held 11 plenary sittings, of which nine were devoted mainly to a general discussion of the problems before the session. At its eleventh sitting the Committee adopted the reports and conclusions submitted by its two subcommittees, along with nine resolutions.[2]

Membership of the International Labour Organisation

GUYANA

Guyana became a Member of the International Labour Organisation by a decision of the International Labour Conference on 8 June 1966. The documents relating to the admission of Guyana are reproduced below:

LETTER FROM THE PRIME MINISTER OF GUYANA TO THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL OF THE INTERNATIONAL LABOUR OFFICE

Georgetown, 28 May 1966.

Sir,

I have the honour to apply, on behalf of the Government of Guyana, for membership of the International Labour Organisation under paragraph 4 of article 1 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation and request that this application be laid before the General Conference.

The Government of Guyana hereby accepts the obligations of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation.

The Government of Guyana will bear its share of the expenses of the International Labour Organisation in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution of the Organisation, and will make the necessary arrangements concerning its financial contribution with the Governing Body.

The Government of Guyana recognises that it continues to be bound by the obligations entered into on behalf of the territory of Guyana by the United Kingdom in respect of the following Conventions:

No. 2. Unemployment, 1919;
No. 5. Minimum Age (Industry), 1919;
No. 7. Minimum Age (Sea), 1920;
No. 10. Minimum Age (Agriculture), 1921;
No. 11. Right of Association (Agriculture), 1921;
No. 12. Workmen's Compensation (Agriculture), 1921;
No. 15. Minimum Age (Trimmers and Stokers), 1921;
No. 19. Equality of Treatment (Accident Compensation), 1925;
No. 26. Minimum Wage-Fixing Machinery, 1928;
No. 29. Forced Labour, 1930;
No. 42. Workmen's Compensation (Occupational Diseases) (Revised), 1934;
No. 45. Underground Work (Women), 1935;
No. 50. Recruiting of Indigenous Workers, 1936;
No. 64. Contracts of Employment (Indigenous Workers), 1939;
No. 65. Penal Sanctions (Indigenous Workers), 1939;
No. 81. Labour Inspection, 1947;
No. 86. Contracts of Employment (Indigenous Workers), 1947;
No. 94. Labour Clauses (Public Contracts), 1949;
No. 95. Protection of Wages, 1949;
No. 97. Migration for Employment (Revised), 1949;
No. 98. Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining, 1949;
No. 105. Abolition of Forced Labour, 1957;
No. 108. Seafarers' Identity Documents, 1958;
No. 115. Radiation Protection, 1960.

The Government of Guyana undertakes to ratify in full immediately Convention No. 87 concerning freedom of association and protection of the right to organise, 1948, and to examine immediately the following Conventions, which had hitherto been applied with modifications, to ascertain whether it would be possible to eliminate the circumstances which originally made a modification necessary:

No. 8. Unemployment Indemnity (Shipwreck), 1920;
No. 17. Workmen's Compensation (Accidents), 1925;
No. 32. Protection against Accidents (Dockers) (Revised), 1932;
No. 58. Minimum Age (Sea) (Revised), 1936;
No. 59. Minimum Age (Industry) (Revised), 1937;
No. 63. Statistics of Wages and Hours of Work, 1938;
No. 88. Employment Service, 1948.

The Government of Guyana undertakes to examine, as early as possible, the following Conventions on which a decision had hitherto been reserved to determine whether it could remove the conditions which led to the original conclusion that a decision must be reserved:

No. 3. Maternity Protection, 1919;
No. 14. Weekly Rest (Industry), 1921;
No. 16. Medical Examination of Young Persons (Sea), 1921;
No. 22. Seamen's Articles of Agreement, 1926;
No. 24. Sickness Insurance (Industry), 1927;
No. 25. Sickness Insurance (Agriculture), 1927;
No. 27. Marking of Weight (Packages Transported by Vessels), 1929;
No. 35. Old-Age Insurance (Industry), etc., 1933;
No. 36. Old-Age Insurance (Agriculture), 1933;
No. 37. Invalidity Insurance (Industry), etc., 1933;
No. 38. Invalidity Insurance (Agriculture), 1933;
No. 39. Survivors' Insurance (Industry, etc.), 1933;
No. 40. Survivors' Insurance (Agriculture), 1933;
No. 44. Unemployment Provision, 1934;
No. 56. Sickness Insurance (Sea), 1936;
No. 68. Food and Catering (Ships' Crews), 1946;
No. 69. Certification of Ships' Cooks, 1946;
No. 70. Social Security (Seafarers), 1946;
No. 74. Certification of Able Seamen, 1946;
No. 77. Medical Examination of Young Persons (Industry), 1946;
No. 89. Night Work (Women) (Revised), 1948;
No. 90. Night Work of Young Persons (Industry) (Revised), 1948;
No. 92. Accommodation of Crews (Revised), 1949;
No. 99. Minimum Wage Fixing Machinery (Agriculture), 1951;
No. 101. Holidays with Pay (Agriculture), 1952;
No. 102. Social Security (Minimum Standards), 1952.

The Government of Guyana undertakes to continue to apply the non-metropolitan Conventions which the United Kingdom had applied hitherto, until it is able to ratify the corresponding " metropolitan " Conventions.

(Signed) L. F. S. BURNHAM,
Prime Minister.

EXTRACTS FROM THE FIFTH REPORT OF THE SELECTION COMMITTEE TO THE 50TH SESSION OF THE INTERNATIONAL LABOUR CONFERENCE

. . . . . .

2. Since Guyana is not at present a Member of the United Nations, its admission to membership of the International Labour Organisation is governed by paragraph 4 of article 1 of the Constitution of the Organisation, which provides as follows:

> 4. The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation may also admit Members to the Organisation by a vote concurred in by two-thirds of the delegates attending the session, including two-thirds of the Government delegates present and voting. Such admission shall take effect on the communication to the Director-General of the International Labour Office by the government of the new Member of its formal acceptance of the obligations of the Constitution of the Organisation.

3. The independence of Guyana was officially proclaimed on 26 May 1966.

4. From the foregoing it appears that Guyana is today a fully self-governing State which has the same international status as the other Members of the International Labour Organisation. There is, therefore, no doubt that the applicant Government has the international status necessary to enable it to discharge the obligations involved in membership of the International Labour Organisation.

5. The Conference will note that in its letter of 28 May 1966 the Government of Guyana has already communicated to the Director-General of the International Labour Office the formal acceptance by that Government of the obligations of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation.

6. The Conference will also note that in the same letter the Government of Guyana recognises that Guyana remains bound by the obligations of the international labour Conventions which had formerly been declared applicable by the United Kingdom to the territory of Guyana; that it undertakes to ratify immediately the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948; that it undertakes to examine a number of further Conventions with a view to ratification; and that it undertakes to continue to apply the non-metropolitan Conventions which the United Kingdom had applied hitherto until it has been able to ratify the corresponding " metropolitan " Conventions.

7. The representative of the Government of Guyana assured the Subcommittee appointed by the Selection Committee to examine the application that it is the policy of the Government of Guyana to respect the freedom and independence of employers' and workers' organisations. These organisations elect their officers freely, are financed by their own membership and may form national federations which can affiliate freely with international organisations.

8. The Selection Committee accordingly submits to the Conference for adoption the following resolution:

At its ninth plenary sitting, held on 8 June 1966, the International Labour Conference adopted by 376 votes to 0, with no abstentions, the resolution concerning the admission of Guyana to the International Labour Organisation.

Implementation of Instruments Adopted by the International Labour Conference [1]

Constitution of the International Labour Organisation Instruments of Amendment (Nos. 1, 2 and 3), 1964 [2]

Ratifications or Acceptances

The following ratifications or acceptances of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation Instruments of Amendment (Nos. 1, 2 and 3), 1964, have been communicated to the Director-General of the International Labour Office.

ETHIOPIA

The ratification by Ethiopia of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation Instruments of Amendment (Nos. 1, 2 and 3), 1964, was received by the Director-General of the International Labour Office on 11 June 1966.

The text of the instrument of ratification is as follows:

Conquering Lion of the Tribe of Judah,
HAILE SELASSIE I,
Elect of God, Emperor of Ethiopia,

To all to whom these presents shall come, greetings:

Be it known that, whereas the Instruments for the Amendment of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation (Nos. 1, 2 and 3), 1964, adopted by the Forty-eighth Session of the International Labour Conference, Geneva, 1964, as well as the Conventions No. 2 of 1919, 111 of 1958, and 116 of 1961 of the International Labour Organisation have been submitted to Us for ratification;

And whereas, in accordance with the provisions of Our Constitution the ratification of the aforementioned amendments and Conventions is reserved to Us; and that no other formalities are required for the said amendments and Conventions to be binding upon the Empire of Ethiopia;

Having seen and examined the text of the Amendments and Conventions;

Now, therefore, We declare by these presents, that We do hereby approve and ratify the said Amendments and Conventions and declare the same to be binding upon the Empire of Ethiopia.

In witness whereof We have hereunto set Our hand and caused to be affixed Our great seal.

Given at Our Imperial Court at Addis Ababa, on this the 23rd day of the month of Ganbot in the year of Our Lord one thousand nine hundred and fifty-eight (Ethiopian Calendar) corresponding to the 31st of May in the year one thousand nine hundred and sixty-six (Gregorian Calendar) and of Our reign the thirty-fifth.

(Signed) HAILE SELASSIE I,
Emperor.

NIGERIA

The ratification by Nigeria of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation Instruments of Amendment (Nos. 1, 2 and 3), 1964, was received by the Director-General of the International Labour Office on 26 May 1966.

The text of the instrument of ratification of Instrument of Amendment No. 1 is as follows:

Whereas the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation Instrument of Amendment (No. 1), 1964, was adopted by the Conference at its Forty-eighth Session held at Geneva on July 6th, one thousand nine hundred and sixty-four, and is subject to ratification:

And whereas the Government of the Federal Republic of Nigeria in accordance with its constitutional procedure has agreed to confirm and ratify the Instrument of Amendment (No. 1), 1964, and undertake faithfully to perform and carry out all the stipulations therein contained:

And whereas it is provided in Article 5 (1) of the said Instrument that the formal ratification shall be communicated to the Director-General of the International Labour Office:

And whereas by virtue of the Constitution (Suspension and Modification) Decree, 1966, the Federal Executive Council has delegated to me the power to execute this Instrument:

Now therefore, I, Edwin Ogebe OGBU, Permanent Secretary, Ministry of External Affairs, hereby confirm and ratify the International Labour Organisation Instrument of Amendment (No. 1), 1964, on behalf of the Government of the Federal Republic of Nigeria.

Done at Lagos this seventh day of May 1966.

(Signed) Edwin Ogebe OGBU,
Permanent Secretary,
Ministry of External Affairs.

The texts of the instruments of ratification of Instruments of Amendment Nos. 2 and 3 are in similar terms.

Ratifications of International Labour Conventions and Declarations concerning the Application of Conventions to Non-Metropolitan Territories

[NOTE. The publication of information concerning the ratification and application of international labour Conventions does not imply any expression of views by the International Labour Office on the legal status of the State having communicated a ratification or declaration, or on its authority over the territories in respect of which such ratification or declaration is made ; in certain cases these may present problems on which the I.L.O. is not competent to express an opinion.]

AUSTRALIA

The communication from the Minister of Labour, Youth and Sport, which constitutes the instrument of ratification of these Conventions, is in similar terms to the communication which constitutes the instrument of ratification of the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81).[1]

CYPRUS

Ratification of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), and the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98).

The ratification by Cyprus of Conventions Nos. 87 and 98 was registered by the Director-General of the International Labour Office on 24 May 1966.

The communication from the Minister of Labour and Social Insurance which constitutes the instrument of ratification of Convention No. 87 is as follows:

Nicosia, 13 May 1966.

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Government of the Republic of Cyprus, having considered the International Labour Convention No. 87 concerning freedom of association and protection of the right to organise and having completed all procedures for ratification of international Conventions in accordance with our Constitution and Municipal Law, hereby confirm and ratify the same and undertake, in accordance with article 19, paragraph 5 (d), of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation, faithfully to perform and carry out all the stipulations therein contained.

In witness whereof, I have signed these presents at Nicosia, Cyprus, on the 13th day of May 1966.

Yours faithfully,

(Signed) Tassos PAPADOPOULOS,
Minister of Labour and Social Insurance.

The communication which constitutes the instrument of ratification of Convention No. 98 is in similar terms.

The communication from the Minister of Labour and Social Affairs which constitutes the instrument of ratification of these Conventions is as follows:

Baghdad, 12 April 1966.

Dear Mr. Morse,

Reference is kindly made to our letter No. 25956 dated 31.7.1965.

In the report attached to the above-mentioned letter you were kindly informed that the following Conventions, along with their respective draft laws of ratification, had been submitted to the Council of Ministers for final approval:

1. Unemployment Indemnity (Shipwreck) Convention, No. 8, 1920.
2. White Lead (Painting) Convention, No. 13, 1921.
3. Minimum Age (Trimmers and Stokers) Convention, No. 15, 1921.
4. Examination of Young Persons (Sea) Convention, No. 16, 1921.

Now that the Council of Ministers has approved the ratification of those instruments, I have the honour to enclose herewith Laws Nos. 178, 176, 171, 177 for 1965 concerning the ratification of the above-mentioned Conventions respectively.

I avail myself of this opportunity to renew the assurance of my highest consideration.

Yours faithfully,

(Signed) Faris Nasser AL-HASSAN,
Minister of Labour and Social Affairs.

The texts of the laws mentioned in this communication are similar to those of Law No. 110 of 1965 concerning the ratification of the Hours of Work (Industry) Convention, 1919 (No. 1).[1]

JORDAN

Ratification of the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29); the Minimum Age (Underground Work) Convention, 1965 (No. 123); and the Medical Examination of Young Persons (Underground Work) Convention, 1965 (No. 124).

The ratification by Jordan of Conventions Nos. 29, 123 and 124 was registered by the Director-General of the International Labour Office on 6 June 1966.

The texts of the communications from the Minister of Social Affairs and Labour which constitute the instruments of ratification of these Conventions are as follows:

2 June 1966.

Sir,

Further to letter No. S11/200/12533 dated 25 November 1964 of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, I have the honour to inform you that the Government of the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan, having considered the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29), hereby confirm and ratify the same and undertake, in accordance with article 19, paragraph 5 (d), of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation, faithfully to perform and carry out all the stipulations therein contained.

The Decision of the Council of Ministers, No. 745, dated 31 October 1964, regarding the ratification of this Convention, was approved by Royal Assent.

With the expression of my highest consideration,

(Signed) Saleh BURGAN,
Minister of Social Affairs and Labour.

2 June 1966.

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Government of the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan, having considered the Minimum Age (Underground Work) Convention, 1965 (No. 123), hereby confirm and ratify the same and undertake, in accordance with article 19, paragraph 5, of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation, faithfully to perform and carry out all the stipulations therein contained.

[1] See Official Bulletin, Vol. XLVIII, No. 4, Oct. 1965, pp. 326-327.

I have also the honour to append hereto, pursuant to Article 2, paragraph 2, of the Convention, a declaration prescribing the minimum age for admission of persons to employment underground in mines.

The Royal Decree (No. 298) approving the ratification of this Convention as published in the Official Gazette of 10 April 1966 (No. 1913) has already been communicated to you.

With the expression of my highest consideration,

(Signed) Saleh BURGAN,
Minister of Social Affairs and Labour.

2 June 1966.

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you, in accordance with Article 2, paragraph 2, of the Minimum Age (Underground Work) Convention, 1965 (No. 123), that the minimum age for admission of persons to employment underground in mines in Jordan is sixteen years.

With the expression of my highest consideration,

(Signed) Saleh BURGAN,
Minister of Social Affairs and Labour.

2 June 1966.

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Government of the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan, having considered the Medical Examination of Young Persons (Underground Work) Convention, 1965 (No. 124), hereby confirm and ratify the same and undertake, in accordance with article 19, paragraph 5 (d), of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation, faithfully to perform and carry out all the stipulations therein contained.

The Royal Decree (No. 298) approving the ratification of this Convention as published in the Official Gazette of 10 April 1966 (No. 1913) has already been communicated to you.

With the expression of my highest consideration,

(Signed) Saleh BURGAN,
Minister of Social Affairs and Labour.

Minutes of the Governing Body 161st Session [2]

This volume contains a record of the discussions of the Governing Body, the documents relating to the various items on the agenda, and the decisions taken at its 161st Session (1-5 March 1965).

Documents of the International Labour Conference (50th Session)

In preparation for the 50th Session of the International Labour Conference (June 1966) the Office published the following reports:

Draft Budget: Programme and Budget Proposals 1967 and Other Financial Questions [3]

The report contains eight sections. Each section contains, as appropriate, notes on action taken by the Governing Body, information on relevant items submitted or to be submitted to the General Conference, factual statements on financial or budgetary questions of concern to the Conference, and extracts from relevant documentation.

Summary of Reports on Ratified Conventions [1]

This volume represents the first part of the report submitted in connection with the third item on the agenda: "Information and reports on the application of Conventions and Recommendations." [2]

Article 22 of the Constitution of the I.L.O. requires each Member to agree to make an annual report to the International Labour Office on the measures which it has taken to give effect to the provisions of Conventions to which it is a party. Article 23 provides that the Director-General of the I.L.O. shall lay before the Conference a summary of the reports communicated in pursuance of article 22.

The present summary, which covers the period from 1 July 1963 to 30 June 1965, contains information on the Conventions in force at that time, and in certain cases information received too late for inclusion in last year's summary. A table indicating ratifications and, in the case of non-metropolitan territories, declarations of application, appears under each Convention. Voluntary reports (in respect of Conventions which are not in force for the countries concerned) supplied by certain governments are also summarised.

The present publication conforms to a decision taken by the Governing Body at its 134th Session (March 1957) laying down new criteria for the inclusion of information in the summary of annual reports, in order to reduce its size and to focus attention on the detailed particulars given in the first reports submitted following ratification and on important changes in the subsequent application of a Convention. This volume includes, therefore, as regards first reports, the principal legislation and regulations giving effect to a Convention, information on the manner in which each of its substantive Articles is implemented and a brief record on the way in which it is applied in practice. In the case of all subsequent reports mention is made only of information supplied in response to a request or an observation of the Committee of Experts or of the Conference Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations (unless these replies have already appeared in the reports of one or the other of these Committees, in which case the summary merely refers to the relevant document), or of important changes which have occurred in the legislation or practice of a country. Information on practical application (statistics, etc.) and on changes of secondary importance is no longer summarised, but separate mention is made, under each Convention, of countries which have supplied such data and of countries which refer to or repeat information previously reported.

As decided by the Governing Body at its 142nd Session and endorsed by the Conference at its 43rd Session (both held in June 1959), and confirmed by these bodies in 1961, governments need supply detailed reports only every two years. For this purpose Conventions in force have been divided into two groups, and detailed reports are requested in alternate years on one of these groups. This year's summary covers primarily the reports on the Conventions in the first of these groups as well as other reports which are also due under the above-mentioned decision (first reports or cases of serious divergences between the national law and practice and the provisions of a ratified Convention observed by the Committee of Experts or the Conference Committee).

The summaries of reports on the application of Conventions in non-metropolitan territories are printed in a separate section, following that concerning metropolitan countries.

Information supplied by the governments of new member States, which is summarised in the metropolitan countries section of the report, is limited to particulars not previously included in the non-metropolitan territories section of the report. As indicated above, these reports cover a period ending 30 June 1965.

At the end of the respective sections of the summary information is given regarding the communication by governments of copies of their reports to the representative organisations of employers and workers.

The summary covers the reports received by the Office up to 15 February 1966.

Summary of Information relating to the Submission to the Competent Authorities of Conventions and Recommendations Adopted by the International Labour Conference [1]

In accordance with article 23 of the Constitution a summary of the information communicated in pursuance of article 19 is submitted to the Conference. The present summary contains information relating to the submission to the competent authorities of the Conventions and Recommendations adopted by the Conference at its 48th Session (June 1964).

The present report also contains a summary of additional information relating to the submission to the competent authorities of the Conventions and Recommendations adopted by the Conference at its 31st to 47th Sessions (1948 to 1963). The information summarised in this report consists of communications which were forwarded to the Director-General of the International Labour Office after the close of the 49th Session of the Conference and which could not, therefore, be laid before the Conference at that session.

Report of the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations [2]

This volume contains the report of the 36th Session (Geneva, 14-25 March 1966) of the Committee of Experts appointed by the Governing Body of the I.L.O. to examine the information and reports submitted under articles 19, 22 and 35 of the Constitution by Members of the International Labour Organisation upon the application by them of Conventions and Recommendations.

The Committee's report is divided into four parts. The first, " General Report ", contains the general observations of the Committee on the application of Conventions and Recommendations and their submission to the competent authorities. The Committee notes that from 1 January to 31 December 1965 a total of 126 ratifications were registered (73 new ratifications and 53 resulting from the continuance by new member States (Malawi, Malta, Singapore) of the obligations undertaken on their behalf by the States which were previously responsible for their international relations). At the time of the adoption of the Committee's report the total number of ratifications amounted to 3,122.

The second part of the report contains the observations of the Committee concerning particular countries, divided into three chapters: observations concerning annual reports on ratified Conventions (article 22 of the Constitution); observations on the application of Conventions in non-metropolitan territories (article 22 and article 35, paragraphs 6 and 8, of the Constitution); and observations concerning the submission to the competent authorities of the Conventions and Recommendations adopted by the International Labour Conference (article 19 of the Constitution). Governments have the opportunity of replying to these observations during the International Labour Conference.

The third part deals with the submission of international labour Conventions and Recommendations to the competent authorities in federal States under article 19, paragraph 7, of the I.L.O. Constitution. Of the 18 States invited to submit information, 12 replied; the scope of the study therefore covers basically these countries (Argentina, Australia, Austria, Cameroon, Canada, Federal Republic of Germany, India, Nigeria, Switzerland, U.S.S.R., United States and Venezuela).

The fourth part deals with labour inspection in industry, commerce, and mining and transport undertakings. It contains general conclusions on the reports concerning the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), the Labour Inspection Recommendation, 1947 (No. 81), and the Labour Inspection (Mining and Transport) Recommendation, 1947 (No. 82).

The volume also contains the Special Report by the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations concerning the Measures Taken by the

Reports Prepared for the International Labour Conference (51st Session)

In preparation for the 51st Session of the International Labour Conference (June 1967) the International Labour Office has published the following reports.

Examination of Grievances and Communications within the Untertaking [1]

The first chapter of the present report summarises the proceedings of the 50th Session of the Conference relating to the examination of grievances and communications within the undertaking (extracts from the report of the Conference Committee; Proposed Conclusions with a view to the adoption of a Recommendation concerning the examination of grievances within the undertaking with a view to their settlement and Proposed Conclusions with a view to the adoption of a Recommendation concerning communications within the undertaking, submitted by the Conference Committee; and discussion in plenary sitting). The second chapter contains the text of the two proposed Recommendations prepared by the Office on the basis of the Proposed Conclusions. The purpose of the report is to transmit these texts to governments so as to enable them to send in any amendments or comments.

Improvement of Conditions of Life and Work of Tenants, Share-Croppers and Similar Categories of Agricultural Workers [2]

At its 163rd Session (November 1965) the Governing Body of the International Labour Office decided to place on the agenda of the 51st (1967) Session of the International Labour Conference an item entitled " Improvement of conditions of life and work of tenants, share-croppers and similar categories of agricultural workers ".

The subject is to be discussed under the double-discussion procedure as laid down in article 39 of the Standing Orders of the Conference. Accordingly, the Office has compiled the present preliminary report for communication to governments, preparatory to a first discussion by the Conference at its 51st Session. The report relates in summary form the background and some of the antecedents to the Governing Body's action, and describes the relevant law and practice in a representative number of member States.

After a first chapter containing introductory remarks, the chapters which follow deal respectively with security of tenure, payment for the use of land and remuneration for services rendered, arbitration and settlement of disputes, access to land, and some aspects of living conditions. Finally, the report contains conclusions and a questionnaire to which governments are requested to reply with specific suggestions.

Eighth Conference of American States Members of the International Labour Organisation (Ottawa, 1966)

Report of the Director-General: Social Development in the Americas [3]

" Social development in the Americas " is the theme of the report which the Director-General will be presenting to the Eighth Conference of American States Members of the International Labour Organisation. Three chapters deal successively with the following questions: economic evolution and social needs; employers' and workers' organisations and labour relations as a means and an expression of social participation; and participation of employers' and workers' organisations in planning. A report on the technical co-operation activities of the I.L.O. in the region is contained in an appendix, which lays special stress on management development and small-scale industry and on vocational training.

Labour Inspection: A World Survey of National Law and Practice [1]

This survey consists of an extract from the report of the 36th (1966) Session of the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations. Its nine chapters deal with the following subjects: methods of application and scope of the instruments relating to labour inspection; functions of labour inspection; organisation and staff of labour inspection; powers of labour inspectors; violations and penalties; special obligations of labour inspectors; means available to and action of the labour inspection services; labour inspection reports; and difficulties and progress in applying the Convention. These are followed by the Committee's conclusions. The legislation consulted has been classified by countries.

An appendix in the form of a table shows the reports requested and reports received by 25 March 1966 under article 19 of the I.L.O. Constitution.

Metal Trades Committee

(Eighth Session, Geneva, 6-17 December 1965)

The Eighth Session [1] of the Metal Trades Committee of the International Labour Organisation was held at the International Labour Office, Geneva, from 6 to 17 December 1965.[2]

The Committee adopted the following reports, conclusions and resolutions:

(1) the report of the Subcommittee on International Co-operation, with the conclusions (No. 63) concerning international co-operation in dealing with manpower, social and labour problems in the metal trades in the developing countries;

(2) the report of the Subcommittee on Programming and Planning, with the conclusions (No. 64) concerning the role of employers' and workers' organisations in programming and planning in the metal trades;

(3) the report of the Working Party on the Effect Given to the Conclusions and Resolutions Adopted by the Metal Trades Committee at Its Previous Sessions, with the classification of those conclusions and resolutions;

(4) the resolution (No. 65) concerning a reduction in hours of work without reduction of income in the metal trades;

(5) the resolution (No. 66) concerning women workers in the metal trades;

(6) the resolution (No. 67) concerning labour statistics in the metal trades;

(7) the resolution (No. 68) concerning freedom of association and trade union rights in the metal trades;

(8) the resolution (No. 69) concerning future action of the International Labour Organisation relating to the metal trades; and

(9) the resolution (No. 70) concerning the agenda of the Ninth Session of the Metal Trades Committee of the International Labour Organisation.

These texts and a summary of the discussions leading to their adoption appear on the following pages.[3] In addition, a Consolidated Text of Conclusions and Resolutions Adopted by the Metal Trades Committee at Its Previous Sessions is reproduced as an appendix to the report of the Working Party on the Effect Given to the Conclusions and Resolutions Adopted by the Metal Trades Committee at Its Previous Sessions.

REPORTS AND CONCLUSIONS ADOPTED

Report of the Subcommittee on International Co-operation [1]

Composition and Officers of the Subcommittee

1. The Subcommittee on International Co-operation in dealing with manpower, social and labour problems in the metal trades in the developing countries was composed of 27 Government members, 26 Employers' members and 26 Workers' members, namely 79 members in all.

2. The Subcommittee appointed its officers as follows:

Chairman : Mr. A. A. SHTERNOV (Government member, Ukraine).

Vice-Chairmen : Mr. H. ESCOTO OCHOA (Employers' member, Mexico); Mr. A. SOLÓRZANO (Workers' member, Peru).

Reporter : Mr. S. V. PURUSHOTTAM (Government member, India).

On behalf of their respective groups the Employers' and Workers' spokesmen of the Subcommittee, while having no objection as to the person of the Chairman, expressed their reservations as to the procedure followed in the election of the Chairman, observing that they had not been consulted beforehand.

3. The Subcommittee held seven sittings.

4. During its third sitting the Subcommittee, in accordance with article 20 of the Standing Orders for Industrial and Analogous Committees, set up a Working Party to draw up draft conclusions, composed of the following members, in addition to the Chairman of the Subcommittee:

Government members :

Titular members :

Belgium:	Mr. J. DEROO.
India:	Mr. S. V. PURUSHOTTAM.
United Kingdom:	Miss S. A. OGILVIE.

Deputy members :

France:	Mr. C. LAPIERRE.
Mexico:	Mr. H. BLANCO MELO.
United States:	Mr. R. E. RICCIUTI.

Employers' members :

Titular members :

Mr. H. ESCOTO OCHOA (Mexico).
Mr. A. G. ROBERTSON (United Kingdom) (personal substitute: Mr. C. C. D. MILLER).
Mr. C. SCHLÜTER (Switzerland).

Deputy members :

Mr. R. JACCARD (France) (personal substitute: Mr. F. X. AZAIS).
Mr. F. A. JASDANWALLA (India).
Mr. H. PÉREZ (Chile).

Workers' members :

Titular members :

Mr. D. R. AGUIRRE (Argentina).
Mr. A. L. DRUCE (Australia).
Mr. F. HAUSER (Federal Republic of Germany).

Deputy members :

Mr. K. JOSEPH (India).
Mr. A. LAVAL (France).
Mr. P. H. MENGER (United States).

Terms of Reference of the Subcommittee

5. The Subcommittee was called upon to consider the second item on the agenda of the Committee: " International co-operation in dealing with manpower, social and labour problems in the metal trades in the developing countries ". The Subcommittee had before it a report on that subject prepared by the Office.[1]

6. The representative of the Secretary-General recalled that, in examining the suggestions tabled by the Metal Trades Committee itself at its Seventh Session, the Governing Body of the International Labour Office had wished to give the Committee an opportunity to express its views on the importance of industrialisation, and particularly of the metal trades, in development and also on how manpower problems and social problems which were hampering development of that industrial sector or were being caused by it could best be solved through international co-operation.

General Remarks on Industrialisation and the Role of the Metal Trades in Development

7. The importance of industrialisation in development was unanimously recognised by the Subcommittee, which saw in it a means of harnessing an ever-growing share of national resources, material as well as human, to serve the economic and social progress of each developing country. A Workers' member, however, pointed out that care must be taken to avoid being too dogmatic on the subject and that theories stressing specialisation in primary production or restricted industrialisation might in some cases not be entirely valueless. A Government member stressed that speedy industrialisation was not an end in itself, but that industrialisation activities should be brought into line with the development of the various sectors of the economy and a close watch should be kept on trends, such as inflation, which might have an effect on the living conditions of the people.

8. The Subcommittee listed hindrances to industrialisation, which it defined as being mainly, but to varying degrees according to the country, the difficulty in obtaining access to raw materials or power supplies, scarcity of capital, dearth of skilled manpower and restricted export markets. Concerning the last item a Government member regretted that the restrictive nature of international trade often deprived developing countries of the outlets which were essential to them. In the industrial field, he added, the developing countries had many problems in common with the developed countries, but the former feel them much more acutely.

9. The Subcommittee recognised that the metal trades played an important role in the process of industrialisation. In themselves they provided a great many job opportunities and part of their production went to support the mining and manufacturing industries or was used in most of the other sectors of the economy.

10. Development of the metal trades, however, encountered obstacles in regard to industrialisation in general, and these were pointed out by the Subcommittee. A Government member stated that, for lack of sufficient capital, the economy was confined within the narrow boundaries of industries which could not reach the level of expansion they ought to reach considering the natural resources of the country. In most of the developing countries the most powerful brake on progress in the metal trades was the shortage of skilled manpower, such as technicians, engineers, instructors, foremen and supervisors.

International Co-operation

11. In the opinion of the Subcommittee international co-operation was one of the best ways for achieving industrial progress and thus speeding up the development of backward countries. It provided a stimulus which, through a real effort of will on the part of the recipient countries, enabled them to emerge from their original state of underdevelopment.

As several members of the Subcommittee emphasised, such action was not charity but constituted real co-operation. This co-operation was all the more necessary because, far from being filled, the gap between the advanced countries and those in the process of development was becoming still wider. An Employers' member said that, despite all the efforts that had been made, industrialisation in his country had not kept pace with the rapid growth of the population.

12. Several members of the Subcommittee expressed the opinion that, however broad and diverse might be the assistance given by governments on a bilateral basis and by private industrial companies, it was desirable to concentrate more especially on the assistance which was channelled through the international organisations, particularly those belonging to the United Nations family, whose disinterestedness could not be questioned. A Workers' member suggested that the industrial companies might pay a tax to the United Nations of which the yield could be used for encouraging the development of industrialising countries.

13. The Subcommittee as a whole recognised that, by reason of its tripartite nature, the I.L.O. had a very special role to play in international co-operation, and a Government member expressed the wish that it should increase its activities aimed at promoting development. Another Government member considered that I.L.O. assistance should be concentrated on the most important needs of the developing countries. Such assistance should be provided on a regional basis, through regional centres responsible for supervising it, negotiating with the governments and collecting data on the needs of the region. The I.L.O. should also intensify its assistance to departments of labour and to employers' and workers' organisations.

14. Several members stressed the need for co-ordinating international co-operation activities in order to avoid any overlapping between the various programmes and to make the best use of all the resources made available to the developing countries. Co-ordination between the donor countries was indisputably insufficient and could be improved by various means, for instance by meetings at ministerial level between several countries taking part in technical co-operation activities relating to one particular region.

Choice of Techniques

15. The problem concerning the choice of techniques and of equipment to be used by the metal trades of the developing countries was discussed at length in the Subcommittee. It was noted that modern techniques were attractive to those countries by reason of their efficiency. Although they should not, without due consideration, make use of modern machinery when they did not have the skilled workers required to operate it, in some cases it was better to have recourse at the outset to advanced techniques which, by their use, could stimulate other industries and lead to the more rapid training of a skilled labour force. In the first stages of industrialisation, moreover, it was permissible for developing countries to enlist the aid of foreign experts who could train staff to take over from them at the local level. Conversely, consideration might be given to the installation or development, as a first step, of industrial undertakings using simpler equipment and employing more manpower. Finally, the Subcommittee was of the opinion that the developing countries should adopt those solutions which were best suited to their economic and social conditions, particularly in regard to their resources in capital and in skilled manpower.

16. In this regard the Subcommittee considered the advantages and disadvantages of using second-hand machinery. Some members were clearly against such a solution. In their opinion, although it undoubtedly led to savings at the time of purchase, the higher running costs and the poor yield from such equipment largely offset that advantage. Second-hand machines slowed down the process of development and diminished competitive ability. Other members observed that the purchase of used machines was a normal practice, even in the industrialised countries, and could therefore be recommended—subject to necessary control as to the condition of such equipment—since it was preferable to have second-hand machines than to have none at all. As and when the labour force improved its technical skills and more capital became available, such machines could be replaced by new equipment. The sale of second-hand equipment sometimes led to an agreement to train the workers who were to use it in the importing country, such training being given by instructors provided by the firm selling the equipment. No uniform solution could be found for this problem. The destination of the manufactured goods should be borne in mind: the equipment could be more or less up to date, according to whether the production was intended for domestic or foreign consumption, competitiveness at the international level representing a very important criterion in this respect. Each country should therefore make its choice based on the priorities it had to observe.

Development of Human Resources

17. Since manpower and particularly skilled manpower resources were one of the key factors in the growth of the metal trades, the Subcommittee examined the means for developing those resources. First of all, the Subcommittee realised that it was necessary to have as accurate data as possible regarding manpower needs, since underemployment in an industrialisation programme could lead to economic losses which were quite as serious as shortage of manpower. In this connection the lack of adequate statistics on the total numbers available and the categories of workers employed in the metal trades of the developing countries was pointed out; it was suggested that the I.L.O. should make an additional effort in this field and try to obtain more accurate information from the governments.

18. It was recognised that one of the most serious difficulties hindering industrialisation was the lack of vocational and technical training facilities, which was aggravated by deficiencies in primary education systems. Several members stressed the urgent need to provide a basic education for the population as a whole. With regard to vocational training, the Subcommittee agreed that it was not advisable to transfer unchanged to the developing countries the methods currently in use in the advanced countries, and that vocational training should be adapted to the individual needs of each country. Several members pointed out that vocational training programmes should take account of the introduction into industry of modern techniques.

19. Vocational training systems were given consideration by the Subcommittee. Several members said that it was preferable to provide vocational training on the spot in the developing countries and that training in the factory itself had many advantages. Other members also brought out the usefulness of practical training courses. The Workers' members expressed the opinion that undertakings with foreign participation should devote some of their resources to training their workers; undertakings which did not provide such training should pay a tax which would be used for training skilled workers and technicians.

20. The Subcommittee considered it desirable that talented people should be given an opportunity to receive further training in industrial institutions and firms located in the industrialised countries. That applied especially to technicians, instructors, foremen and managerial personnel. In that connection it was noted that the International Centre for Advanced Technical and Vocational Training, in Turin, which had recently been set up, held out enormous opportunities which the countries in the course of industrialisation should draw upon to an increasing extent. A Government member said that the importance of higher-grade personnel and specialists in development was such that they should be generously accorded access to technical schools and colleges in the industrialised countries. A Workers' member expressed the opinion that trainees in factories should be protected by suitable collective agreements and that their numbers should not exceed a given proportion of the workers employed in the firm receiving them, so as to ensure that their training could be carried out in favourable conditions. Another Workers' member considered that trainees should receive a training that was adapted to the needs of their country.

21. The Subcommittee laid great stress on the need for training national instructors, both in the developing countries and abroad, with a view to giving a cumulative effect to vocational training activities. Foreign technicians and foreign supervisory staff could undoubtedly play an important role in the first stages of such training but they would gradually make way for similar personnel who would be nationals of the country concerned.

22. The Workers' members regretted the inadequacy of measures to encourage promotion of workers in the developing countries. They pointed out that promotion to jobs as foremen and to the higher grades was often made difficult for these workers on such grounds as their social origin or other considerations; in their opinion every worker who had the necessary aptitudes should be provided with the means for obtaining vocational training at all levels.

23. The importance of international co-operation in the field of vocational training was brought out very clearly. In that connection stress was laid on the special role of the I.L.O. on account of its tripartite structure. It was suggested that the I.L.O. should intensify its studies on the type of assistance which should be offered to each country—according to the stage of development it had reached—and particularly on the training programmes established for the metal trades, bearing in mind the production techniques that were available in the developing countries.

Living and Working Conditions

24. Many comments and suggestions were submitted in regard to living and working conditions in the metal trades in the developing countries. The Workers' members strongly recommended that every effort should be made to raise those conditions to the highest possible level, in regard both to wages and social benefits and to working hours. It was desirable not only for workers in the developing countries that these conditions should be brought into line with those prevailing in the industrialised countries but also for workers in the latter countries who would otherwise be threatened by competition caused by lower manpower costs.

25. A Workers' member suggested that, in order to offset imbalance which might be caused in an under-industrialised country by the presence of modern undertakings able to pay high salaries, some measures might be taken either in the form of taxation or by what could be called a " socialised wage ", namely by increasing fringe benefits in relation to wages, including those concerning housing, vocational training, etc. Another Workers' member was opposed to any wage system based on piece-work since it was harmful to the health and safety of the labour force.

26. With regard to working hours the Workers' members drew attention to the importance of putting into application the instruments adopted by the I.L.O. in that field.

27. The Subcommittee recognised that productivity in the developing countries depended mainly on the level of trade skills, quality of the supervisory personnel, quality of the equipment, working conditions, and satisfactory labour-management relations within the undertaking. The adaptation of workers coming from the countryside to urban and industrial life also played a part in productivity, and their adaptation should be made easier for them. The introduction to modern methods and techniques, coupled with the obligation to lead a new type of life, could give rise to serious psychological difficulties, although the problem was less acute in some regions.

28. The Subcommittee expressed the opinion that, if a solution could be found to these various problems, it would not only help to diminish absenteeism but would also reduce the excessive labour turnover which occurs in some of the developing countries.

29. The Subcommittee also paid attention to the special problems of given categories of workers. Women undoubtedly accounted for a considerable proportion of the labour force employed in the metal trades, particularly in some sectors, such as electronics. That fact should therefore be taken into consideration when drawing up vocational training programmes. Men and women should moreover be granted equal treatment for equal work; such equality should apply to all working conditions and especially to wage systems.

30. It was noted that the distinction between manual and non-manual workers was beginning to be less clearly defined as technical progress increased. Preference for non-manual jobs in the developing countries could undoubtedly have an adverse effect, but that should not conceal the fact that there were other aspects to the problem of non-manual workers: the high proportion of non-manual workers in the metal trades emphasised the need for bearing that category in mind when evaluating manpower requirements and organising vocational training.

31. In the opinion of the members of the Subcommittee attention should also be given to the problems of migrant workers because their movements, within one particular country or from one country to another, could become very significant in some developing areas. It was pointed out that workers emigrated because they were forced to do so by necessity; the way to prevent such population movements and the human suffering they entailed would be to increase investments in the countries concerned, which would lead to the establishment of new jobs.

Labour-Management Relations

32. The Subcommittee was unanimous in considering that care should be taken to avoid repeating in the developing countries the errors which characterised the early stages of industrialisation in Europe in the field of labour-management relations. The establishment of good relations between employers and workers was essential to industrial progress, and no economic development could take place without lasting industrial peace. The flow of capital and proper development of human resources were possible only in countries where a satisfactory social climate prevailed; productivity could not reach a high level in an uneasy atmosphere and without full co-operation between the two parties concerned.

33. The Subcommittee as a whole recognised that, in this respect, governments had a special responsibility because it was for them to set up the appropriate legislative and administrative framework and, in particular, to encourage the establishment and development of employers' and workers' organisations capable of assuming the responsibilities devolving upon them.

34. The importance attaching to strengthening the trade union movement in the developing countries was frequently stressed. The Workers' members remarked that a rather arbitrary distinction was sometimes drawn between militant and constructive trade unionism. If the former type of trade unionism existed, it was because of the unstable conditions in which the working masses in the developing countries lived and worked and because the trade union was the natural defender of the worker. The existence of powerful trade unions became all the more important as international interests became more influential in the metal trades sector. For their part, the trade unions were ready to play a constructive role in economic and social development. In this connection the Workers' members recalled two resolutions that were adopted by the Metal Trades Committee at its Seventh Session, in 1962, which envisaged tripartite co-operation in setting up and putting into effect national and international development programmes. In this connection the Subcommittee unanimously recognised that the employers' and workers' organisations should be very closely associated with technical assistance activities.

35. The need to develop the education of trade union leaders so that they could take part in development programmes was mentioned by several members of the Subcommittee. The Workers' members pointed out that not only should trade union leaders be trained to perform their tasks but they should also be helped to carry them out by receiving all the necessary information without which they could not participate effectively in drawing up and implementing these programmes.

Small-Scale Industries

36. The Subcommittee dwelt on matters that were of particular concern to small-scale industries. All the members agreed that, taken as a whole, small-scale industries could make a weighty contribution to ensuring a sustained rate of economic growth, mainly because they could provide a great many jobs and because they encouraged the training of local technical personnel who could, in turn, be drawn upon by large-scale industries. Moreover, small firms, on account of their specialisation in a given type of production, could complement the large undertakings to the advantage of both.

37. Considering, however, that quite a number of small undertakings existed by subcontracting, the Workers' members called attention to the hazards to working conditions which that practice involved. Forced to conform to the unsatisfactory conditions that in some cases were imposed upon them by the undertaking for which they were producing, these firms might find themselves obliged to reduce their cost price by cutting down expenditure on those items where they found it possible. Since they able to were reduce neither the power costs nor the cost of raw materials, they might be tempted to cut manpower costs by lowering the wage levels and by extending hours of work without granting adequate compensation. The workers employed by these subcontractors were all the more deprived of protection because they were frequently hired on a part-time basis and hence rarely organised. In the opinion of the Workers' members the small firms which had recourse to such methods might become centres of social retrogression and could even bring about a lowering of the standards applied in the large undertakings.

38. The Workers' members stated that it was necessary to extend the benefits of labour legislation and the protection of factory inspection to the manpower employed in all small firms, whether subcontracting or not. In their opinion conditions of work should be the subject of collective bargaining in small undertakings as in large ones. Moreover, assistance programmes for small undertakings should be provided only for those which, in regard to their staff, promised to respect the labour standards generally applicable in their country.

39. Several Government members stressed the need for such assistance programmes to small-scale industries either at the national or the international level. One member recalled that the International Labour Conference, at its 46th (1962) Session, had adopted a resolution laying down on broad lines how the I.L.O. could provide assistance to small-scale industries. Another Government member suggested that international assistance could include the provision of equipment to small undertakings.

Problems relating to International Co-operation Experts

40. Some comments were made on the recruitment of international co-operation experts and the qualifications they should be expected to have. It was recalled that the tripartite principle should be applied when recruiting such experts. Career problems which they had to solve would be settled more easily if they were offered longer contracts. Their training was extremely important and some countries had already taken special measures regarding it. When an expert was called upon to train instructors it was desirable that he himself should already have a technical career behind him, and some members of the Subcommittee expressed their preference for older men who had acquired knowledge and experience. It was pointed out that the briefing period spent by experts at I.L.O. headquarters before reaching their place of appointment was usually too short. It was mentioned that experts should certainly have technical skills but they should also have the type of personality which enabled them to adapt themselves to the conditions of the countries to which they were appointed and to understand their specific problems. In this connection it might be preferable to have recourse to experts originating from countries which were still in the first stages of industrial development. Finally, it was suggested that, upon their return, experts should diffuse widely their experience as agents of technical co-operation by describing—for instance in the International Labour Review—the problems they encountered and how they managed to solve them.

Adoption of the Draft Conclusions

41. At its sixth sitting the Subcommittee had before it the draft conclusions drawn up by the Working Party. The draft conclusions as a whole were adopted unanimously, subject to a reservation made by an Employers' member respecting the use of the terms " national industrialisation policy " and " development programmes ".

Adoption of the Report

42. At its seventh sitting, on 16 December 1965, the Subcommittee unanimously adopted the present report.

Examination by the Committee of the Report and of the Draft Conclusions concerning International Co-operation in Dealing with Manpower, Social and Labour Problems in the Metal Trades in the Developing Countries

At its eighth plenary sitting the Committee had before it the foregoing report, together with the draft conclusions concerning international co-operation in dealing with manpower, social and labour problems in the metal trades in the developing countries.

In submitting the report and the draft conclusions Mr. PURUSHOTTAM (Government delegate, India; Reporter of the Subcommittee on International Co-operation) pointed out that the report and its appendix accurately reflected the work which had been accomplished in the Subcommittee and in the Working Party which it had set up. The report was divided into eight parts dealing respectively with industrialisation and the role of the metal trades in development; international co-operation; choice of techniques; development of human resources; living and working conditions; labour-management relations; small-scale industries; and problems relating to international co-operation experts. The report and the conclusions appended to it had been unanimously adopted by the members of the Subcommittee. The discussions had taken place in an atmosphere of perfect mutual confidence and understanding and in a spirit of co-operation under the able guidance of its Chairman.

The report highlighted two aspects of the problem of international co-operation, namely employment of women workers in the metal trades and the need for primary education to serve as a starting point for workers to receive advanced vocational training. Those two points had not been mentioned in the list contained in the excellent Report II, which had been prepared by the I.L.O. as a basis for discussion. The credit belonged to the members of the Subcommittee, who had stressed the importance of those two problems to the developing countries, whose governments were facing a gigantic task. All the members of the Subcommittee, whether they came from the developing or the more advanced countries, had shown great interest in the whole subject and great understanding of the problems of countries in the course of industrialisation.

Mr. AGUIRRE (Workers' delegate, Argentina) said that the Workers' group was completely satisfied with the report of the Subcommittee on International Co-operation and with the conclusions appended thereto, and recommended their adoption.

Mr. ESCOTO OCHOA (Employers' delegate, Mexico; Vice-Chairman of the Subcommittee on International Co-operation) stressed that the report faithfully reflected the discussions that had taken place in the Subcommittee. The Employers' group considered it to be highly satisfactory.

The Committee unanimously adopted the report and conclusions (No. 63) concerning international co-operation in dealing with manpower, social and labour problems in the metal trades in the developing countries. The text of the conclusions is reproduced below.

Conclusions (No. 63) concerning International Co-operation in Dealing with Manpower, Social and Labour Problems in the Metal Trades in the Developing Countries [1]

The Metal Trades Committee of the International Labour Organisation,

Having met in Geneva in its Eighth Session from 6 to 17 December 1965;

Adopts this seventeenth day of December 1965 the following conclusions:

Preamble

1. It is generally agreed, in both the developing and the industrialised countries, that governments, employers' organisations [2] and workers' organisations should co-operate energetically in the industrialisation of the developing countries.

2. Such co-operation is only possible on the basis of full mutual understanding and trust, which alone can ensure that all relevant problems will be solved in a constructive spirit.

[1] Adopted unanimously.

[2] The term " employers' organisations " in this and other paragraphs should be interpreted in a wide sense, to include action by individual employers.

3. The greatest attention should be given to the special characteristics of each developing country, for instance its economic, social, demographic and technical conditions, including the availability of raw materials, its domestic market conditions, exporting possibilities, and, in particular, the quantity and quality of its manpower.

4. The speed of the population increase—a factor which considerably affects the growth of industrialisation in most developing countries—lends urgency to the problem and, apart from the need for vocational training, the necessity for sound primary education should not be overlooked.

5. Good relations should be encouraged between employers and workers within the undertakings established in the developing countries, and between their respective organisations, thus contributing to a favourable climate for collective bargaining.

Role of the Metal Trades in Development

6. Industrialisation has an important role to play in economic and social development. In fact, it is gradually mobilising an ever-increasing share of national resources designed to build up an economic structure that is characterised by a dynamic sector composed of the manufacturing industries capable of providing the means of production and consumer goods that are required for economic and social progress.

7. The metal trades have a predominant role to play in that regard. Their role cannot be estimated merely in relation to the place attributed to the metal trades in industrial production or to the total number of jobs they directly provide, although in that respect they are in the forefront since they are looked upon as a sector with a very high proportion of manpower. Their importance is largely and perhaps mainly based on the fact that part of their production provides the tools that will be used by the other sectors in their productive processes, and they therefore have a multiplying effect in stimulating employment and contribute to the growth of auxiliary industries. This importance is emphasised whenever there is a contraction of the market and, above all, of employment. The metal trades are also a dynamic factor in promoting technical and scientific development that helps the economy as a whole.

Manpower Problems

8. The metal trades are characterised, to varying degrees, by extensive needs for capital. They would not, however, be able to aspire to a lasting expansion unless a sufficiently skilled labour force is progressively built up to take advantage of available capital resources and new techniques. In both these areas equal attention should be given to the problems of male and female workers. The development of human resources and more specifically the continuous improvement of technical skills are thus one of the key factors for development of the metal trades. The effort of international co-operation should largely be concentrated on that aim.

9. The developing countries are, to a varying extent, characterised by an abundance of unskilled manpower. On the other hand, they are handicapped by a marked shortage of skilled and semi-skilled manpower, of technicians, engineers, instructors, foremen and managerial staff. Since the requirements of the metal trades are particularly pressing in those categories, the national authorities should draw up a vocational guidance and training policy, coupled with full employment and the rational development of human resources, its objectives being determined on the basis of short-term and long-term needs. It is desirable that this policy should be established in co-operation with the employers' and workers' organisations and, if the national authorities deem it desirable, with the aid of technical advice furnished by experts.

10. The need to base the development of human resources on suitable primary education should receive special attention from the authorities responsible for the education policy in the developing countries.

11. Vocational guidance should not merely be aimed at encouraging the necessary manpower towards the trades requiring workers, but should be directed at attracting into industry talented people, too many of whom, in many countries, tend to enter administrative jobs and the professions.

12. The organisation and extension of vocational training for manual and non-manual workers should be among the first concerns of the governmental authorities and of the employers' and workers' organisations. They should make full use of all the means of training available to them: vocational training schools, centres for apprenticeship, training centres for adults, in-service training in factories, etc. They should pay special attention to the cumulative effects of training, namely the training of teachers and instructors, as well as the training of personnel who will later occupy key posts in maintenance and repair, supervision and management. They should arrange for opportunities for vocational training and measures to encourage promotion to supervisory and managerial posts to be put into effect in accordance with the provisions of the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958.

13. International technical co-operation programmes should be directed towards providing the developing countries with suitable means for training projects carried out in their own country or in their own particular region. Such assistance could take many forms: establishment or help towards establishing and equipping training centres, sending of experts, technicians and instructors, training carried out in firms with foreign participation set up in the developing countries. With regard to the last-mentioned type of assistance, it is desirable that the training provided by firms with foreign participation should extend to all skill levels and include supervisory and managerial grades.

14. Measures should also be taken to ensure that nationals of developing countries, selected for the increased contribution they would thus be able to make towards developing their country, are provided with the means, including financial and technical assistance, for finishing their training in the industrialised countries, either in factories or in training centres. It is important to find a satisfactory solution to the difficulties which may arise for trainees mainly because of differences in language and way of life and those caused by the temporary nature of the employment of such trainees in factories.

Choice of Techniques

15. The choice between very advanced and less advanced techniques brings into play a great many economic and social considerations. The basic aims in view, which are on the one hand to reach a high degree of productivity and thus to speed up economic growth and, on the other, to provide jobs for abundant manpower, may seem divergent in the preliminary stages of development, although in the long run they tend to merge. Adoption of modern techniques is essential in some cases, as for instance on account of international competition. Recourse to outmoded techniques would retard the progress of countries just beginning to be industrialised. Nevertheless, the use of intermediate techniques, requiring simple, robust and efficient equipment, can show substantial advantages, both in relation to production costs and to jobs. In any event, each country should select the equipment and machinery which are best suited to its own economic programme. Developing countries should not be persuaded to use second-hand machinery against their will.

Contribution of Small-Scale Industry to Development

16. The contribution that small-scale industry can make towards development is of special importance in the metal trades. Taken collectively, small firms can do a great deal towards achieving a sustained rhythm in economic growth, alongside the large undertakings. It is desirable that both categories of production units should complement each other.

Living and Working Conditions

17. Workers coming from the countryside often encounter difficulties, especially in the early stages of industrialisation, in adapting themselves to the tasks entrusted to them in the factory. Differences between their former living conditions and those of their new surroundings are sometimes too great to be rapidly surmounted. Labour discipline, observance of timetables and of safety regulations, work in two or three shifts, frequently seem completely alien to their former behaviour pattern. Special attention should therefore be given to considerations of that nature and to plant and community measures to facilitate the adaptation of the workers and their families when setting up new firms or drawing upon new sources of manpower in the metal trades. The development of industrial manpower in less industrialised countries or areas is often affected by the migration of new and large groups of national workers to more industrialised centres or countries.

18. Payment for work done raises some delicate problems requiring solution. Obviously it is unacceptable that industrialisation should result in low wages, diminished social benefits and disregard of trade union rights, which would be a serious social injustice. It should, however, be borne in mind that the existence of modern factories, capable of paying high wages, in a still under-industrialised area can cause problems that must find economic and social solutions in accordance with the interests of the various sectors of the community.

19. The equipment and working environment in the metal trades of developing countries should be designed or adapted to suit the average physiological characteristics of the workers and the climatic conditions. All the machinery to be used should be equipped with suitable safety devices and the workers should be taught to make use of them under proper supervision. Decisions on its use must give priority to the safety, health and welfare of the worker.

20. In general, it is essential that every new metal trades factory built in a developing country should be in conformity with the provisions of national legislation in regard to working conditions, safety devices, material and installations. Its activities must be exemplary in the social as well as the technical field, and it must ensure that its workers have good conditions of safety, health and welfare, accompanied by appropriate social services, so that the community living near the factory is assured of as satisfactory a standard of life as possible.

21. Special attention should be paid, in regard to wages and general working conditions, to small firms in the metal trades, whether producing for the general market or for other firms. The manpower employed by such firms must be accorded all necessary protection, both in law and in fact. Protection through collective bargaining, legislation and factory inspection can be enhanced by making sure that programmes of national and international assistance to such firms insist upon adherence to those standards.

22. Productivity is as dependent upon good working conditions and fair wages as it is upon the level of manpower skills, able supervision, the quality of equipment and suitable factory environment. Every effort should therefore be made in that regard in order to improve productivity of the metal trades in developing countries. That in itself might help to diminish absenteeism and excessive labour turnover which adversely affect some of those countries.

Labour-Management Relations

23. It cannot be stressed too much that satisfactory labour-management relations can greatly contribute to industrial development. The State, employers' organisations and trade unions all have their part to play in determining and putting into effect the national industrialisation policy.

24. The responsibility of the government in the ultimate drawing up and application of industrialisation policy is evident. In many developing countries the government is the main employment provider and, as such, takes on special responsibilities to create a healthy climate of labour-management relations. In addition, it must encourage the development of employers' and workers' organisations. It is desirable that governments of developing countries should take account, in that respect, of the special needs and the size of the metal trades industry.

25. Attempts to achieve industrialisation and implementation of a policy requiring the support of the whole population can scarcely be successful without the participation of employers' and workers' organisations in preparing development programmes. This is especially true in the metal trades industry, a key sector. In order to play that role, the employers' and workers' organisations must be strong enough and sufficiently independent to exercise a real influence. Moreover, their leaders should be sufficiently well informed to represent them adequately at all levels.

26. At the level of the enterprise the establishment of satisfactory labour-management relations makes an essential contribution to industrial development by encouraging the adaptation of workers to industrial life and the increase of productivity.

27. The workers' representatives should be given a role in organising and putting into effect vocational training and other initiatives designed to help in raising manpower skills.

28. Governments of developing countries should consult the employers' and workers' organisations of the metal trades when drawing up requests for technical co-operation and when implementing projects concerning this sector. It is also desirable that the employers' and workers' organisations of the industrialised countries should be given the opportunity to take part in international co-operation programmes that are put into effect by those countries.

Special Role of the I.L.O.

29. Industrialisation brings into play a whole series of factors which fall directly within the mandate of the International Labour Organisation, such as labour policy, manpower planning, vocational training, management development and productivity, living and working conditions and social institutions which form the framework for industrial relations. Moreover, the tripartite structure of the I.L.O. and the fact that this Organisation includes among its Members countries that are representative of the whole range of social and economic development render it especially qualified to give guidance to countries which are unable to expedite their own development without having recourse to international co-operation. The Industrial Committees can make a special contribution in this regard since, by the extent and diversity of their experience and their representative nature, they are able in full knowledge of the facts to evaluate the needs of their respective sectors and to arouse understanding and support for industrialisation policies among those most directly concerned. In order to make the best possible use of all the advantages offered by the I.L.O., by the other international organisations and through bilateral programmes, it is desirable that the various programmes of international co-operation should be established in the light of the special aims of the I.L.O., together with its important role in the past and in the present.

Development of Human Resources.

30. In its activities relating to employment policy the I.L.O. should pay special attention to the possibilities of productive employment offered by the metal trades not only to men but also to women and young persons in rural areas as well as in towns, and the job prospects which development of those trades can open up in other sectors of industry.

31. In addition, when carrying out its activities for manpower planning, the I.L.O. should devote special attention to assessing the present and future manpower trends and needs of the metal trades at all skill levels; it should also help in preparing programmes correlated to those needs so that this key sector will in due course have available a labour force endowed with the necessary qualifications. To that end, the I.L.O., within the scope of its possibilities and taking account of its programme, should collect statistical data, in each developing country, relating to population, working population, number of workers engaged in the metal trades, their skills, their distribution by trade branches, the results and prospects of vocational training, together with the needs and trends of the labour market.

32. It is in the field of vocational training, the most favourable domain for tripartite action, that the I.L.O. should continue to make one of its major contributions to the process of industrialisation. The I.L.O. should intensify its activities relating to the planning and organisation of vocational training, established as an integral part of general development policies, whether by way of initial training, specialisation and advanced training in the course of employment or the progressive adjustment of the labour force to meet the needs of a continuously developing economy. The training of key groups, such as instructors, maintenance staff, foremen and supervisors, should continue to receive special attention. It would, moreover, be useful if the I.L.O. could study and perfect in the light of its experience in many developing countries the training methods which are best suited to the particular conditions of countries in the process of industrialisation and examine the results already achieved in this area.

33. Similarly, the activities of the I.L.O. regarding management development and productivity should be further developed and, in this connection, the metal trades should be given special attention. It is essential that the management staff, in small as well as large undertakings, should be trained in planning and organisational techniques, checking and marketing of production, supervision of staff and labour-management relations so as to ensure that more effective use is made of the equipment and raw materials, together with a more rational utilisation of the labour force in favourable social conditions.

34. In addition to the technical co-operation training activities which, so far, it has carried out mainly at the national level, the I.L.O. should develop its action according to the principal industrial sectors and, in particular, should take into consideration the specific needs of the metal trades. In this connection the governments and, through them, the employers' and workers' organisations of the metal trades should, with the co-operation of the I.L.O., draw largely upon the resources offered by the United Nations Development Programme. Among the measures which this Programme could put into effect, the establishment of inter-enterprise training centres in the metal trades sector, at the national and regional level, would undoubtedly be useful. This would serve to provide a training that would be based on the specific needs of that sector.

35. Such training at the national or regional level could be complemented by instruction aimed at increasing the skills of the best workers, selected from the key categories and distributed among factories or institutions located in the industrialised countries. In this regard it may be pointed out that the Advanced Technical and Vocational Training Centre at Turin specially caters for crafts in the metal trades since it can receive instructors, draughtsmen, foremen, maintenance and repair mechanics and other highly skilled workers in the following branches: general engineering, maintenance, electricity, motor vehicles, farm machinery, sheet metal work, fitting and welding. Instruction given at the Centre also enables high-level staff from the developing countries to become familiar with such subjects as general management of firms, organisation of production methods, and market study. It is particularly desirable that the governments of developing countries, when drawing up their requests for technical co-operation provided by the United Nations Development Programme, should bear in mind the advantages they can derive from the Turin Centre's activities.

Living and Working Conditions.

36. In the field of living and working conditions it is desirable that the I.L.O. should intensify its studies of the different wage systems and wage levels, paying particular attention to the relationship between wages on the one hand and productivity and industrial development on the other, and that it should provide advice on this subject to governments and employers' and workers' organisations in the developing countries. Its activities should also be directed towards the adaptation of equipment, work schedules and rhythm of work to the physiological aspects and social background and customs of the manpower of those countries and generally be aimed at improving safety, health and physical and mental conditions of work, together with social security systems.

Labour-Management Relations.

37. It is desirable that the I.L.O. should intensify its efforts to stimulate a healthy and constructive relationship between all those taking part in the production process. Its action in this field should on the one hand be directed towards assisting governments to prepare and implement labour legislation and administration based on I.L.O. standards and to participate in training personnel in methods of labour administration and factory inspection. It should aim, on the other hand, at encouraging the establishment and development of employers' and workers' organisations capable of coping with the special responsibilities incumbent upon them in the course of industrialisation.

Small-Scale Industries.

38. It is desirable that the I.L.O. should pay special attention to the specific needs of small firms, by collaborating to that end with the various organs of the United Nations family which can contribute to their development. The measures taken for that purpose by the I.L.O. in co-operation with those other organs should induce the governments of developing countries to give small-scale industries the place which should be attributed to them in their economic development programmes and contribute towards establishing institutions that could give them the necessary services. Such technical co-operation activities should be aimed at putting small-scale industries on a footing enabling them to provide for their own development. It might also be useful to explore the possibilities of supplying countries in the course of industrialisation with equipment which could be made available to small undertakings.

Problems relating to International Co-operation Experts

39. The recruitment of international co-operation experts encounters some difficulties arising mainly from problems caused by their secondment from their administration or the undertaking in which they are employed, for example maintenance of continuity in their career and benefits deriving from it, such as promotion, pension rights, etc. Steps should be taken to smooth out such difficulties, in particular by having recourse to the employers' and workers' organisations concerned. Tripartite action, at the national level in the countries concerned, could enable experts to be recruited judiciously and in an organised manner, and could permit the working out of arrangements so that experts might be assured with regard to their future.

40. Special training courses should be arranged for experts, including possibly language courses and an insight into the traditions and way of life of the countries to which they are assigned, so as to give them the opportunity to add to their technical skills the special qualifications and background knowledge that are necessary for carrying out technical co-operation projects.

41. Experts of the International Labour Office should adapt their activities to international standards of work. Moreover, it is their duty to work in very close co-operation not only with government services but also with employers' and workers' organisations.

Co-ordination of International Co-operation

42. In dealing with international co-operation, lack of co-ordination of efforts and overlapping constitute an irrational use of inestimably valuable resources. In order to prevent this, energetic action should be taken. It is desirable that countries which offer technical co-operation, whatever its nature, through bilateral or multilateral agreements, should be invited to co-ordinate their efforts in so far as is possible. Whenever appropriate, it is recommendable that they should address themselves either to the International Labour Organisation or the United Nations, in co-operation with specialised bodies in the developing countries. In that way international co-operation could be carried out in accordance with orderly general planning.

Report of the Subcommittee on Programming and Planning [1]

Composition and Officers of the Subcommittee

1. The Subcommittee on Programming and Planning in the Metal Trades was composed of one Government member, one Employers' member and one Workers' member from each of the delegations represented on the Committee.

[1] Adopted unanimously.

2. The Subcommittee appointed its officers as follows:

Chairman :

Mr. P. ARNOW (Government member, United States).

Vice-Chairmen :

Mr. B. MACARTY (Employers' member, United Kingdom); Mr. H. G. BARRATT (Workers' member, United Kingdom).

Reporter :

Mr. H. BUSTARRET (Government member, France).

On behalf of their respective groups the employers' and workers' spokesmen of the Subcommittee, while having no objection to the person of the Chairman, expressed reservations as to the procedure followed in the election of the Chairman, observing that they had not been consulted beforehand.

3. The Subcommittee held six sittings.

4. During its fourth sitting the Subcommittee appointed a Working Party to prepare draft conclusions, composed of the Chairman and the Reporter and the following members:

Government members :

Titular members :

Chile: Mr. C. COSTA-NORA.
U.S.S.R.: Mr. I. IVANOV.
United Kingdom: Mr. P. McC. BOYD.

Deputy members :

Australia: Mr. A. D. FOGARTY.
Italy: Mr. L. DI CLEMENTE.
Switzerland: Mr. O. H. SCHLUCHTER.

Employers' members :

Titular members :

Mr. B. MACARTY (United Kingdom).
Mr. F. A. MALTUSCH (Federal Republic of Germany).
Mr. J. J. WADDLETON (United States).

Deputy members :

Mr. E. BOURSIER (France).
Mr. D. P. MUKHERJEE (India).
Mr. H. O. SEEGER (Peru).

Workers' members :

Titular members :

Mr. H. G. BARRATT (United Kingdom).
Mr. V. G. MAZZACANO (United States).
Mr. F. OPEL (Federal Republic of Germany).

Deputy members :

Mr. J. MAIRE (France).
Mr. M. ROŽIĆ (Yugoslavia).
Mr. S. ZAN-BAR (Israel).

Terms of Reference of the Subcommittee

5. The Subcommittee was called upon to consider the third item on the agenda of the Committee: " The role of employers' and workers' organisations in programming and planning in the metal trades ". The Subcommittee had before it a report on this subject prepared by the Office.[1]

[1] The Role of Employers' and Workers' Organisations in Programming and Planning in the Metal Trades, Report III. International Labour Organisation, Metal Trades Committee, Eighth Session, Geneva, 1965 (Geneva, I.L.O. 1965) (mimeographed).

6. The representative of the Secretary-General, in introducing the report, recalled that by reason of the actual terms of the item on the Committee's agenda it related mainly to countries with systems of programming and planning covering the metal trades. The fact that the Office had put greater emphasis in its report on countries with such systems and had endeavoured to explain their operation should not, however, be regarded as taking any stand in favour of these systems or of any one of them. This merely followed logically from the terms of the item on the agenda. The representative of the Secretary-General then drew attention to the difficulty of knowing at what point planning and programming began and observed that, while these terms were coming to be used more widely, there was a danger that some of those who used them did not always attach the same meaning to them. The Office had also considered that, if the Committee was to have a useful discussion of the role of employers' and workers' organisations in programming and planning in the metal trades, the report should endeavour to clarify concepts and explain the variety of notions covered by the terms " programming " and " planning ". It had not seemed possible in the report to draw a clear distinction between the two concepts; and the term " planning ", which had been regarded as covering also " programming ", had been defined as " a fairly well developed combination of procedures and systems which enable a coherent body of economic and social goals to be formulated which is aimed at making the best possible use of material and human resources and generally specifies the means and stages by which the goals are to be duly attained." The representative of the Secretary-General further observed that it had not been considered possible to describe programming and planning systems in relation to the metal trades alone, firstly, because such systems were generally set up for the economy as a whole and, secondly, because the Office had little information available on programming and planning in the metal trades alone.

Discussion of Points

7. Following a suggestion made by the Chairman the Subcommittee began a general discussion on the basis of the suggested points for discussion contained in the report prepared by the Office. It was, however, understood that any other points relating to the item under discussion might also be raised by the members of the Subcommittee.

8. The general discussion enabled many Government, Employers' and Workers' members to have a broad exchange of views on the methods used in their own countries to promote economic and social development, either under planning and programming systems such as those which had been stressed in the Office report, or under various types of national policies and programmes which had similar goals from the point of view of economic growth and full employment. This exchange of views enabled several members to supplement or to correct information contained in the Office report regarding the methods of programming and planning practised in their own countries.

9. In the course of the general discussion several members of the Subcommittee stressed the difficulty of discussing the role of employers' and workers' organisations in programming and planning in the metal trades alone, since such measures were generally conceived and applied in relation to the economy as a whole. The discussion therefore often went beyond the metal trades and covered the various methods of employers' and workers' participation in programming and planning systems as a whole.

10. The discussion particularly brought out the variety of notions covered by the terms " programming " and " planning " and of the methods followed in this connection by reason of the differences of political, economic and social systems in the various countries of the world and of their degree of economic development. In spite of the diversity of views expressed in the Subcommittee some common trends of thought came to light in the course of the discussion, which are reflected in the conclusions adopted by the Subcommittee on completion of its work.

11. The Workers' members were in favour of a democratic organisation of the economy based on methods suited to the particular circumstances in each country; and they stressed the need for programming or planning in the metal trades. They emphasised that such programming and planning should not be viewed merely with respect to technical and commercial implications, but also in the light of social objectives: prevention of unemployment, reduction of hours of work, raising the standard of living and, in general, protection of the interests of workers, particularly workers affected by technological development.

12. Recalling the importance of the metal trades in the economy of the various industrialised or developing countries, they maintained that, to ensure full employment and a higher standard of living and social progress in general, governments must assume the necessary responsibility to ensure a balanced and harmonious growth of the metal trades by having recourse to efficient programming and planning methods. The ever-increasing pace of scientific and technological developments in the metal trades and greater freedom of trade gave rise to problems of structural change, modernisation and social assimilation which called for systematic and continuous co-ordination and guidance of policies at the national and even international levels, particularly in such sectors as shipbuilding and the automobile, aircraft and electronics industries. Planning and programming subjected economic and social development to constant observation and control. They should prevent trade cycles and purposeless operations, and should contribute to an increase in production and in efficiency. They by no means called for or precluded nationalisation as a prior condition. It was of course necessary to preserve the freedom of individuals to take initiatives of their own in the economic and social field, but some restrictions must be imposed on it. On too many occasions the workers had found a free market economy to be synonymous with economic Malthusianism, unemployment, waste of effort and investments and production aimed at the greatest possible profit, and failing to meet the needs of the population. In the name of individual freedom the running of the economy could not be left to the whims of the few. Thus planning should not be the task of employers alone. That would amount to control by management. Planning and programming in modern undertakings and government programmes in certain fields, whether short-term or long-term, were not new and their implementation was perfectly practicable. It was rather the lack of programming and planning which should be regarded as an omission. While requirements of planning differed from country to country, planning had a common feature in all: it must meet basic human needs.

13. The Workers' members further observed that questions of programming and planning should be considered in the light of the Declaration of Philadelphia and the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation, which brought out the notion of the common good and the need to develop the economy for the benefit of society. In view of the resolution (No. 58) concerning programming techniques in the metal trades, adopted by the Metal Trades Committee at its Seventh Session, and the resolution concerning the concept of democratic decision-making in programming and planning for economic and social development, adopted by the International Labour Conference at its 48th Session (1964), it was out of the question that the Committee's current session should attempt to reconsider the principles contained in these resolutions. The question was how to implement them.

14. As to planning methods, the Workers' members stressed that all planning or programming should be tripartite or, where appropriate, bipartite; free and independent employers' and workers' organisations should actively participate in it, together with representatives of the government or planning and programming authorities; and the plans drawn up should receive in their implementation the support of competent commissions at all levels of the economy (national, regional and undertaking). The co-operation of scientific and technical institutions should also be obtained.

15. The Workers' members also called for a strengthening of the participation by European trade unions in international organisations, such as the European Coal and Steel Community and the European Common Market.

16. In the opinion of the Workers' members planning and programming would help to clarify problems for employers and workers. They would certainly lead to a broadening of the functions of trade unions and employers' organisations, which must adapt themselves to new situations; they would not change industrial relations, however, which would continue to be based on free collective bargaining. An incomes policy could in any event be considered only in connection with a general economic policy and prices policy and provided it aimed at an increase in real income through faster industrial growth. An incomes policy should apply to all incomes, not just wages. If workers' organisations were to be able to play their part in planning and programming, they must enjoy full independence and, in particular, their right to protest.

17. The Employers' members of Belgium, Canada, France, the Federal Republic of Germany, India, Italy, Japan, the United Kingdom and the United States each made known their attitude to methods of programming and planning in the economy. They came out very clearly in favour of the principle of free enterprise and the market economy and stressed that it was an indispensable condition for economic and social development and progress.

18. The Employers' member of the United States in particular recalled that while his country might be classified among the most advanced industrial nations it was not very long since it had emerged from a primarily agricultural into a substantially industrial economy, and it was among the younger of the industrial nations. The functioning of the United States economy was traditionally based on freedom of action: freedom in the market place of the customer as well as of the undertakings supplying the customer; freedom of the undertaking and of its competitors to decide what should be made and how much should be made of a particular product; freedom of the undertaking to seek through technical and market research to improve the quality of its products so that it might expand its market and increase the number of jobs; and lastly, freedom to risk its investment and, when it was successful, to receive the rewards not merely in the form of profits but through the creation of new and better jobs. The American economy thus showed a decentralisation of decisions taken to meet the needs of a free market, and the incentive of individual profit was tempered by a sense of responsibility towards society as a whole. The Government could of course reinforce these freedoms by providing a climate favourable to high production and high consumption. This it did through various fiscal and monetary policies, consultations with employers and workers, measures to promote general education and vocational training and, possibly, legislation to prevent abuses and injustices. Such policies and measures were appropriate and necessary and served the needs of industry, the workers and the community. They could not, however, in the opinion of the employers of the United States, be regarded as planning measures similar to those which had been stressed in the Office report.

19. The Employers' member of the Federal Republic of Germany recalled that a very high percentage of the products of the metal trades manufactured in the world came from a small number of highly industrialised countries with a free economy. His country had rebuilt its economy without programming or planning and the results obtained had been very satisfactory. Workers in the metal trades in his country had wages and a purchasing power which were among the highest in Europe, the country was in the vanguard of world production, and unemployment had disappeared several years ago. It was of course possible in a free economy to recommend and pursue a long-term goal, such for example as would check the effects of economic inflation by restrictive measures; but freedom for undertakings and trade unions was the driving force of progress and ensured the growth of employment.

20. In the opinion of the Employers' member of Canada, free competition which allowed individual undertakings to take their own economic decisions was the system which ensured both the most efficient use of resources and the provision of goods and services desired by free men. So long as the market could operate freely there was no need in Canada, a highly prosperous country, for national economic planning. The federal Government had, however, recently set up an Economic Council, which consisted of highly qualified persons and whose task would be to lay down general guide-lines for economic development of the country in the years ahead.

21. The Employers' member of Italy recalled that while the Subcommittee should discuss the role of employers' and workers' organisations in programming and planning in the metal trades, within the existing economic systems based on programming and planning, it should not draw up instructions to countries to embark on economic programming or planning. In his country the Constitution laid down the principle of the freedom of the private economy and it would be hard to reconcile this principle with a programming and planning system.

22. The Employers' member of the United Kingdom, Employers' Vice-Chairman of the Subcommittee, observed that recourse to tripartite or bipartite methods of carrying out planning or programming in industry depended on the widely differing circumstances found in different countries. While it was true that different levels of development might call for different degrees of control of the economy, the Employers did not believe that over-all planning should be done at all levels of the economy. It was, for one thing, impracticable that workers should be associated in the procedure of drawing up plans at the lower levels of production, since generally they did not have the necessary qualifications. The workers should not interfere in the management of undertakings, and representatives of employers' and workers' organisations were already fully occupied in their normal activities in resolving possible causes of dispute arising from questions relating to wages and working conditions. Planning at the international level hardly seemed to be practicable at the present time in view of the difficulties experienced in achieving economic co-operation in the countries of Western Europe.

23. The Employers' member of Japan stated that in his country the guide-lines of the national plan were drawn up by a tripartite Economic Council which consulted with experts. Plans drawn up by this Council for the various industries were a synthesis of plans drawn up by individual undertakings. There was no collective bargaining in his country at the industry level, but plans drawn up at the level of the undertakings took into account the views of their unions. Employers in Japan considered that they must remain free to decide on their own activities.

24. The Employers' member of France observed that in his country the plan, which applied to the economy as a whole, was conceived as a body of national forecasts made with the participation of the social groups and had a strong institutional character. The plan had its technical, political and psychological aspects by contributing to an understanding of the coherence of the measures contemplated, by committing the Government to a determined financial, economic and social policy and by providing better information on economic matters. The plan provided only a working hypothesis, however, which had no direct impact on the sectors of industry and undertakings. French planning was neither mandatory nor based on direct control. The fundamental rule was that of a market economy, which was an indispensable condition for development and progress because of international competition and the large number of undertakings of all sizes in the metal trades. While the history of French plans showed that their success or failure often depended on outside factors (for example Marshall Aid in the case of the first plan) and while interim plans introduced by executive decision had modified current plans, plans had nevertheless served their purpose by causing the public authorities to set up the infrastructure on which industry and the operation of the market economy must be based.

25. The Employers' member of Belgium considered that it was not for the Subcommittee to decide whether planning or programming techniques were most likely to achieve economic progress and make it keep step as far as possible with social progress. He supported consultation of workers' organisations at the national and sectoral levels of the economy on all social and economic problems, and he recalled that in his country bodies had been set up for this purpose in addition to the form of direct contact made through collective bargaining. Problems of technological development, unemployment and vocational training could be studied by these means without any need for recourse to programming or planning. There did exist in Belgium a programming office which took action after consulting representatives of the social groups and experts and which was responsible for giving economic information and drawing up a draft budget of the economy. The nature of its work, however, was merely indicative.

26. The Employers' member of India recalled that in 1947 India had introduced a planning system which today extended from the national down to the undertaking level. No new factory could be built in his country without government authorisation. In the early days employers had welcomed and supported planning, for it was imperative to make up for many years of delay and priorities had to be established. After 15 years' experience, however, some disillusionment had begun to set in. Difficulties arising in the economic life of his country and mistakes made in the operation of the planning system convinced him that programming and planning should not be advocated as articles of faith.

27. The Employers' member of the U.S.S.R. stated that while recourse might be had to planning under different political, economic and social systems his own country was one which had for many years practised economic planning. He observed that in the last seven years industrial production had increased by 84 per cent. and 5,500 new industrial undertakings had been set up. In the U.S.S.R. the aim of planning was to base forecasts on scientific and objective estimates so as to achieve continuous growth of the national income. For this purpose planning methods were being constantly improved. Undertakings were becoming increasingly interested in attaining higher goals and improving their technology. The undertaking might be becoming more and more autonomous, but that did not impair the unity of planning policy. Government planning was perfectly compatible with the elaboration of economic goals at the undertaking level and with the broad autonomy of the undertaking.

28. The Employers' member of Yugoslavia gave an account of recent developments of programming and planning in the metal trades in his country. Changes in the economic system designed to speed up economic growth would come into effect in 1966 and were aimed at decentralising the planning of the national economy. Plans covering periods of four to seven years would be drawn up for groups of related producers on the basis of plans drawn up by undertakings and their associations. To help the undertakings in drawing up these plans, groups of experts would carry out market research and other economic analyses. Investments would be planned by the undertakings from their own resources, from loans by national banks and from foreign credits. Workers' participation in management was the result of the system of workers' self-management introduced in Yugoslav undertakings.

29. In answer to the argument that workers did not have the necessary qualifications for participation in programming and planning, particularly at the undertaking level, several Workers' members maintained that it was wrong and outmoded to think that questions of programming and planning must be dealt with exclusively by trained engineers and technicians regarded as the only persons competent in this field. Workers were as competent as anyone and should be allowed their full share in planning and programming.

30. There did, of course, exist a problem of workers' qualifications, but firstly, it did not arise only for them, and secondly, it should provide encouragement to ensure that as many workers as possible had the means necessary to increase their qualifications.

31. The Workers' members insisted that programming and planning should be carried out at all levels of the economy, particularly at the level of the undertaking. At that level councils should be set up, where they did not already exist, to study the economic and social effects of plans and programmes drawn up at the level of the undertaking and to consider such questions as production methods, the level of production and sales, etc.

32. The Workers' member of the Netherlands pointed out that in countries with a market economy free enterprise was one of the basic factors of the social progress and prosperity which prevailed today in many countries. But in conjunction with technological development the size of undertakings had increased, the means of production had developed and this growth had been so rapid that it had had a profound effect on society. Decisions taken by managers of undertakings affected not merely the persons closely connected with these undertakings, but in fact society as a whole.

33. The Workers' member of Norway recalled that under the provisions of various basic agreements governing labour-management relations in his country heads of undertakings were required to inform the workers' representatives of the development of the undertaking and the financial problems it involved. On this basis certain principles governing participation by workers in drawing up undertaking plans had been formulated. Consultation within the undertaking between management representatives and workers' representatives was particularly well developed in business corporations. Joint production committees carried out very detailed studies of the financial situation of the undertakings and the production plans. Their conclusions were passed to the management, which informed them of the decisions taken.

34. The Workers' member of the United Kingdom, Vice-Chairman of the Subcommittee, recalled that there were training courses organised in his country for trade union representatives and that the management of undertakings often saw fit to promote workers to supervisory positions. If it had been possible in war-time in his country to set up joint production committees with participation by employers' and workers' representatives there should be no obstacle to the functioning of such committees in time of peace.

35. The Workers' member of Japan pointed out that Japanese trade unions were endeavouring to get production boards established in the undertaking under collective agreements.

36. The Workers' member of France stated that under existing French legislation it was quite possible to examine planning and programming at the level of the undertaking as such by means of the works council. Hitherto, however, this particular feature of the role of works councils had been allowed to remain within the discretion of the employer alone.

37. The Workers' member of Ukraine stated that there were qualified supervisory staff in his country fully capable of participating in planning. It was desirable in his opinion to secure the widest support from workers in order to organise work and increase production. Moreover, courses could be arranged to enable workers and their representatives to make themselves familiar with the different aspects of planning. The workers' representatives in his country participated in planning at all levels from the undertaking up to the highest authorities in the country. Draft plans of undertakings were discussed at working meetings organised by the trade unions and attended by engineers, economists and workers expert in the field. The higher authorities did not adopt any plan without first having consulted the trade union organisations.

38. The Workers' member of Yugoslavia stated that in his country too planning had been practised to a very great extent. It existed at all levels from that of the undertaking and the producers' associations up to the federal level. Its basis was the interest of the undertakings, that is, the interests of the workers of each undertaking; for in his country under the system of workers' self-management the worker was not just a producer, but had managerial functions. This was of fundamental importance in meeting his various aspirations since his role was not limited to working and drawing his wages. Thus the worker aimed at constantly improving his knowledge in the field of the economy of the undertaking and not merely in the technological process of production. If planning was to be done with full factual knowledge, planning operations called for a deep knowledge of the problems involved, training of the worker-producers, and the supply of precise and relevant information to the undertakings, which should be familiar with the potential of the national and international markets and technological progress.

39. Most of the Government members who took part in the discussion were concerned mainly with giving a brief outline of the extent to which methods followed in their countries to ensure economic and social development were or were not based on the notion of programming or planning.

40. The Government member of France stated that in any one country views might differ as to the success or failure of planning. Although he himself was convinced of the merits of free enterprise and was opposed to any government intervention in economic life in a haphazard way, he pointed out that the plan in France was not merely a source of information for the metal trades. It was of course useful from this point of view by making known the Government's mid-term economic policy, the investment programmes covering several years for which the Government was responsible and detailed forecasts for each branch of activity, and at the same time by indicating the future growth of the national economy. The plan served a further purpose, however, in that it clearly brought out structural problems at the industry level (adjustment of the industries to changes in technology and the conditions of international competition, incomes policy). Speaking on his own behalf, he stressed the need to negotiate these matters either on a bipartite or on a tripartite basis according to the preference of the employers' and workers' organisations in dealing with one problem or another. The plan was not infallible and could not in any way guarantee absolute evenness of growth from one year to the next. It was, however, surprising to see how closely mid-term forecasts were fulfilled, and it was observed that even interim plans adopted to meet emergencies had scarcely affected the carrying out of the plan over a four-year period.

41. The Government member of Italy stated that in 1962 the Minister of the Budget in his country had set up a tripartite national commission for economic programming. This body had adopted a number of conclusions, on the basis of which the Minister had proposed a draft programme for economic development. This draft programme had been forwarded for the opinion of the National Economic and Labour Council, an auxiliary body provided for in the Constitution which consisted of experts and representatives from economic and occupational circles. Bearing in mind the opinion expressed by this Council, in October 1965 the Council of Ministers had approved an economic development programme for 1966-70, which was at present before Parliament. This programme aimed at bringing about balance among the various sectors of industry; supplying material requirements in important social services such as schools, housing, public health, social security, vocational training; producing some similarity between pay for agricultural work and pay for non-agricultural work; and removing existing disparities between underdeveloped and developed areas. Increase of production in industry was one of the essential means of attaining the objectives of the plan. It also called for heavy investment. Priority must therefore be given to measures aimed at encouraging or at making more modern and productive various sectors of the economy, including several in the metal trades (machine tools, shipbuilding, etc.). It was of great interest to the metal trades, undoubtedly the most important in the country, to guide their activity within the framework laid down by the plan. In seeking to achieve this aim a very high degree of co-operation between employers' and workers' organisations would certainly be found extremely useful.

42. The Government member of Ukraine recalled that five-year plans had been operating in his country for over 40 years and had been one of the decisive factors of its development. In recent years interest in planning had increased in countries such as India and the United Arab Republic and in some countries of Western Europe. In his opinion no continuous growth of the economy could be achieved unless material and human resources were used through planning in the interests of the State. In his country planning methods, which were being constantly improved, were based on plans of two kinds: plans of five or seven years, and one-year plans.

43. The Government member of the U.S.S.R. pointed out that the development of other sectors of industry was largely conditioned by that of the metal trades, which thus had a direct impact on the material situation of all the workers. He stated that the success of planning in his country depended to a great extent on observing the principles of proportional development among the various sectors of industry and among the various undertakings within a single sector. In some rare instances in the U.S.S.R. the bodies responsible for the plan had not taken into account these considerations which had given rise to difficulties which sometimes retarded industrial development. It was precisely at removing these defects that economic reform in the U.S.S.R. was aimed. The principle of proportional development of the various sectors required that a proper balance should be kept between the various elements on which the success of the plan depended: material and financial elements, manpower, the social element and workers' welfare. Describing the machinery for drawing up five-year and short-term plans, the speaker pointed out that centralised planning in the Soviet Union also took into consideration suggestions made at lower levels, that is, by managers of undertakings and workers' organisations. Through Soviet experience a number of formulas had been developed for participation by workers in drawing up plans at the level of the various undertakings or sectors of industry, and this was contributing to a considerable improvement in planning itself. He further recalled that although planning was clearly subject to the circumstances peculiar to each country, the Subcommittee's main task was to study and compare planning and programming methods in the various countries so that without prejudice to their social system recommendations could later be made which might serve the best interests of the workers in the metal trades.

44. The Government member of the Federal Republic of Germany observed that in his country employers' and workers' organisations participated to quite a large extent in promoting economic development, particularly in such sectors as finance, credits, economic policy, housing, research and transport. The practical results of this participation had been highly successful. Systematic planning, however, did not exist and appeared unnecessary for economic development and expansion. In countries where planning systems were thought desirable, on the other hand, it seemed normal that employers' and workers' organisations should play a very great part in drawing up plans. The Government of the Federal Republic of Germany would, however, hesitate to support recommendations of general planning at all levels.

45. The Government member of Australia stated that the Metal Trades Committee in the opinion of his Government was not a suitable forum for debating the problem of planning since it involved fundamental economic and social principles and could not be examined without reference to the political and economic systems under which these principles were applied. He stated that in several industrialised or developing countries which had had recourse to planning methods a degree of disillusion with the achievements of planning as compared with its promises had become evident. Australia did not have joint industrial planning systems like those which the Office report described, and there was a lack of strong demand from employers and workers for the establishment of such planning arrangements. This absence of any interest in planning might be attributed, in particular, to the fact that trade unions were above all concerned with immediate problems of wages and working conditions and that they were not ideally organised to participate to their best interests in concerted planning, because in the metal trades especially they had not progressed from union organisation based on crafts to organisation based on industries. Moreover, it was doubtful if they would agree even to a small extent to give up their right to advance claims. The employers would likewise be disinclined to give up their managerial rights. Despite the absence of formal detailed planning in Australia, however, there were several examples of government intervention in his country in the regulation of the economy in the form of fiscal, monetary and commercial policies and other measures aimed at maintaining economic stability and a high level of employment. Again, while there was no long-term economic plan as such, the Government for example published long-term forecasts of population and the workforce and set immigration quotas. These forecasts provided a framework for planning by the various authorities concerned with development of the infrastructure (schooling, hospitals, transport, etc.). Furthermore, there was a high degree of consultation and co-operation between the Commonwealth and state governments and the employers' and workers' organisations on a number of questions relating to the development of the Australian economy. Concerted planning arrangements, however, such as were described in the I.L.O. report, did not exist at the industry level except in the case of a few activities such as vocational training. While questioning in a general way whether parties in industrial relations had enough confidence in each other to co-operate in planning, he considered that it could bring about a greater understanding of economic realities among employers and unions and lead to agreements between them which might have a beneficial effect on their mutual relations. On the other hand, trade union members might refuse to identify themselves with leaders who had participated in joint planning, and the gap between union leadership and members might widen and have an unfortunate effect on industrial relations.

46. The Government member of Switzerland observed that although his country had not absolutely rejected planning it had not, on the other hand, established it as a national institution. Some recent steps taken by the Government and Parliament in the field of economic and social policy did have some features of planning, but mistrust of government planning was widespread in Switzerland in industrial circles and even in trade union circles, which feared that their freedom of action might be impaired. The federal Constitution provided for consultation of the economic groups concerned, and successful co-operation between these groups and the public authorities enabled a concerted policy which answered the needs of the country to be drawn up.

47. The Government member of the United States sought to clarify the notion of planning. If to have planning a government must intervene in economic life to set output goals for all sectors of the economy with some detail (even though these goals were not binding on undertakings), then there was obviously no system of comprehensive planning in the United States; the Government believed it unnecessary and inappropriate to set output goals for all industries, and even more so for undertakings. In his country, however, many measures sought to influence over-all output or output in certain industries within the scope of a systematic, coherent and long-term policy. For want of a better term these measures, whose economic goals were probably very similar to those of other countries which had formal planning systems, might also be regarded as planning measures. He gave various examples of measures of economic planning in the United States at all government levels—federal, state and local—and of techniques used to guide economic development (public investment programmes, subsidies and credits, monetary and fiscal policies, etc.). He also stated that the Government and many organisations were carrying out to an increasing extent studies of future consumer trends, development of employment and educational and training needs. The features of economic life in the United States should, however, be borne in mind: it depended on a broad national consensus, which developed only gradually, as to the goals to be achieved, on market forces and on the initiative of free private enterprise and free collective bargaining. Planning, as he understood it, could strengthen these factors, but should not supplant them. Modern human society was too complex to allow total reliance on planning, which was likely to endanger individual freedom and the development of individual responsibility, while failing to satisfy basic human needs.

48. In the course of the discussions several members of the Subcommittee from each of the three groups stressed, firstly, that it was for each country to decide what kind of economy it desired—and this was not just an economic but also a political question; secondly, that the success of planning methods largely depended on the political, economic and social circumstances in which they were applied and that these methods should therefore be adapted to the conditions and needs of the various countries; and thirdly, that the industrialising countries had to deal with particular problems which might call for special solutions from the point of view of the planning methods used to ensure their economic and social development, particularly in view of the greater importance which public undertakings often had than private undertakings in those countries.

49. Some members of the Subcommittee referred to I.L.O. action in the field of programming and planning. The Government member of Ukraine asked that the I.L.O. carry out comparative studies of the various planning methods and make specific recommendations in this connection; that it organise study tours of tripartite delegations to different countries, particularly those which had experience of planning; that it grant fellowships to enable planning specialists to visit these countries; and that courses on methods of planning be included in the programme of activities of institutes operating under the auspices of the I.L.O.

50. Several Workers' members also requested that the I.L.O. should carry out more detailed and frequent comparative studies of planning in all countries, whatever their political system or level of development, and that it should examine the social consequences of programming and planning and particularly methods aimed at ensuring participation by employers' and workers' organisations.

51. Statements were also made in the Subcommittee by two representatives of international federations who attended as observers. The representative of the International Metalworkers' Federation recalled that the resolution (No. 58) concerning programming techniques in the metal trades, adopted by the Metal Trades Committee at its last session, had been accepted unanimously with only four abstentions. This showed that the question was not so controversial as some alleged, and he did not see why the Office had emphasised that it was. Many other I.L.O. instruments had already stressed that workers should participate in drawing up economic policy. He also pointed to the need to have workers participate in the management of undertakings, particularly so as to withstand the social impact of automation. Planning was now a human need and workers should have the right to participate both in short-term and in long-term planning, so as to avoid the effects of arbitrary decisions.

52. The representative of the World Federation of Trade Unions referred to the problem raised by an incomes policy. He noted that there existed a contradiction between the tendency to accept, or even demand, an incomes policy and the tendency to reject programming. He observed that although in some countries a policy of incomes in general was meant, in fact such a policy really related only to income in the form of wages. Finally, it was also erroneous to conceive an incomes policy based on the relationship between wages and productivity with a view to obtaining price stability. Such ambiguities and contradictions arose, in his opinion, from the very structure of the society into which it was sought to introduce an incomes policy.

Submission and Adoption of the Draft Conclusions

53. At its fourth sitting the Subcommittee requested its Working Party to prepare draft conclusions to take into account the different proposals and suggestions made in the course of its discussions. The Working Party submitted to the Subcommittee draft conclusions concerning the role of employers' and workers' organisations in programming and planning in the metal trades.

54. At its fifth and sixth sittings the Subcommittee examined the draft conclusions submitted by its Working Party.

55. The preamble and paragraph 1 of this draft were adopted without opposition.

56. In paragraph 2 the Workers' members proposed an amendment to provide that the solution of the problems mentioned in this paragraph " should call for " instead of " may call for " a co-ordinated industrial policy. This amendment was rejected by 21 votes to 25, with 5 abstentions, and paragraph 2 was then adopted without opposition.

57. Paragraphs 3 and 4 were adopted without opposition.

58. In paragraph 5 the Workers' members proposed an amendment to replace the last sentence with a sentence which would simply state: " Planning and/or programming should always be aimed at promoting social progress and the welfare of all concerned." The part of the sentence relating to creative initiative and the spirit of enterprise would thus be deleted. It was argued that this idea was already expressed in paragraph 3 of the draft conclusions. This amendment was adopted by 24 votes to 20, with 10 abstentions. Paragraph 5 as amended was then adopted without opposition.

59. Paragraph 6 was adopted without opposition, the words " which are able to co-operate " being replaced by the word " co-operating ".

60. As regards paragraph 7 the Subcommittee had before it an amendment proposed by the Workers' member of Italy, who wished to replace the text proposed by the Working Party by the following text:

Since at present all governments must have an economic and social policy and since in certain countries government participates to a considerable extent in various branches of the metal trades, methods of economic forecasting and programming may prevent intervention by the government from being made in an empirical way and allow its policy to be known in advance and carried out with coherence and continuity. They neither imply nor preclude recourse to nationalisation measures. Programming and planning should be of a scientific character and should be based on prior studies of the economic structure of different branches of industry.

This amendment was rejected by 18 votes to 19, with 27 abstentions. The Workers' members then proposed that one sentence in this paragraph, namely that which stated that methods of programming and planning " do not necessarily call for nationalisation ", be replaced with a sentence as follows: " They do not necessarily call for nor preclude nationalisation." On a proposal by the Employers' members, which was agreed to by the Workers' members, the Subcommittee finally decided to delete from paragraph 7 the sentence which it had been proposed to amend. Paragraph 7 as amended was then adopted without opposition, after an amendment proposed by the Government member of the U.S.S.R. to delete the first sentence of paragraph 7 had been rejected by 7 votes to 43, with 11 abstentions.

61. Paragraph 8 was adopted without opposition.

62. Paragraph 9 was adopted without opposition with the insertion of the word " particularly " before " in countries in the course of industrialisation ".

63. The Subcommittee had before it two amendments to paragraph 10. The first, proposed by the Workers' members, sought to replace the first sentence of paragraph 10 by the following text:

In countries where the economy is based wholly or in part on the principle of free enterprise, any programming and/or planning will have to be carried out with the participation of the undertakings.

The second amendment, proposed by the Government member of France, was to add at the end of the first sentence of paragraph 10 the following text:

account being taken, where they exist, of over-all forecasts made at the national level.

The Workers' members having agreed to withdraw their amendment in favour of that which was proposed by the Government member of France, the Subcommittee then adopted without opposition, but with the abstention of the Workers' member of Italy, paragraph 10 as amended by the Subcommittee on the proposal of the Government member of France.

64. Paragraph 11 was adopted without opposition, the words " public control " being replaced by the words " public ownership " and the last sentence being deleted.

65. Paragraph 12 was adopted without opposition, the words " all relevant information " being replaced by the words " all information ".

66. Paragraph 13 was adopted without opposition, the words " in drawing up and putting into effect programming and/or planning measures " being replaced by the words " in drawing up, putting into effect and reviewing programming and/or planning measures ".

67. Paragraph 14 was adopted without opposition. The Workers' members stated, however, that although they agreed to this text in a spirit of compromise they wished to stress that the direct representation of undertakings in addition to employers' and workers' organisations on the committees and bodies responsible for drawing up plans and programmes should not lead to any loss of balance between the representation of employers and that of workers.

68. Paragraph 15 was adopted without opposition with the insertion of the words " particularly those " after the words " in some countries ".

69. Paragraphs 16 and 17 were adopted without opposition.

70. Before voting on the draft conclusions as a whole as amended explanations of their vote were made to the Subcommittee by certain of its members.

71. The Employers' member of Yugoslavia stated that the system of planning and programming which existed in his country differed from systems described in paragraphs 10 and 11 of the draft conclusions, and he regretted this omission since the Yugoslav system interested a growing number of countries. In Yugoslavia, whose economy was based on social ownership and the system of self-management, the free enterprises were themselves responsible for planning and programming of their production, business and investments. They made their plans and programmes on the basis of the situation of the market and with the intention of increasing their income. The planning and programming system of his country was based on the plans and programmes laid down by the free enterprises and their associations. The national plans and programmes provided for the increase of the national income and the financial policy gave support to the free enterprises while seeking to guide their investment and development policies.

72. The Employers' member of the United States said that planning and programming in the common sense of the word as set out in the report prepared by the Office and even as defined in the draft conclusions had been rejected in his country. While repeating that he did not seek to impose his views on anyone he thought that this did not preclude him from calling general attention to the benefits of a free enterprise system. In his view, one of the most significant benefits was free collective bargaining, one for which the underlying freedom of the economy was an absolute prerequisite. To the extent that the economy in general was controlled, free collective bargaining must also be limited. When pressed by a variety of hardships, there was a temptation for some to hand over the responsibility for solutions to government. His experience would indicate that freedom of the economy, on the other hand, whatever its faults, could be a much more reliable way toward successful solutions. One danger in private groups delegating to a government the responsibility for programming and planning was the extreme difficulty—if not impossibility—of retrieving it. He stated that he had said this because he was sure that those who wished might be guided by it.

73. The Workers' member of the United States contested the statement that there was no planning or programming in the United States. In maintaining that there was, he referred in particular to a report submitted to the United Nations by the Government of the United States in 1963 which mentioned various examples of planning in the economic and social fields.

74. The Workers' member of Italy stated that he would abstain from voting on the draft conclusions because they did not sufficiently reflect the concept of planning supported by Italian trade union organisations.

75. The Subcommittee then unanimously adopted the draft conclusions with the abstention of the Workers' member of Italy.

Adoption of the Report

76. The Subcommittee, at its sixth sitting, unanimously adopted the present report.

Examination by the Committee of the Report and of the Draft Conclusions concerning the Role of Employers' and Workers' Organisations in Programming and Planning in the Metal Trades

At its eighth plenary sitting the Committee had before it the foregoing report, together with the draft conclusions concerning the role of employers' and workers' organisations in programming and planning in the metal trades.

In submitting the report and the draft conclusions Mr. BUSTARRET (Government delegate, France; Reporter of the Subcommittee on Programming and Planning) pointed out that the discussion in the Subcommittee had not been as difficult as he had at first feared, since the report had been unanimously adopted and the draft conclusions unanimously, with only one abstention.

The report showed a great variety of opinions, for it contained a summary of the different notions of programming or planning which existed in the different countries and among the different groups.

He wished to draw attention to certain paragraphs in the draft conclusions which he thought unlikely to give rise to controversy. Firstly, paragraph 3 stressed that programming and planning in the draft conclusions were used to cover not only formalised procedures by which a government set output goals as specific sectors of the economy but also policie intended to affect industry as a whole or certain sectors of it in so far as these policies were deliberate, long-term and consistent. Secondly, the interest of these methods of programming and planning in the metal trades was twofold: as stated in paragraph 2, there were problems of structural adjustment, modernisation and social assimilation for which a satisfactory solution might call for a co-ordinated industrial policy; further, as stated in paragraph 5, these methods enabled over-all forecasts to be made which were an important source of information on the possible future growth of the national economy including the metal trades. Thirdly, as stated in paragraphs 4 and 6, the implementation of a programming and/or planning policy should not have the effect of restricting the freedom of action of employers' and workers' organisations in their relations: it was necessary for management and labour to be represented, as appropriate, by their respective organisations. Finally, thanks were due to the Chairman and the Vice-Chairmen, who had maintained a calm atmosphere in the discussions, and to the secretariat for its help and co-operation in drawing up the report and the draft conclusions.

Mr. MACARTY (Employers' delegate, United Kingdom; Vice-Chairman of the Subcommittee on Programming and Planning) said that the spirit of compromise which had marked the Subcommittee's discussions was most welcome and had led to their successful conclusion. On behalf of the Employers' group he hoped that the report and the draft conclusions would be adopted by the Committee.

Mr. BARRATT (Workers' delegate, United Kingdom; Vice-Chairman of the Subcommittee on Programming and Planning) said that while the draft conclusions were not entirely what the Workers' group might have desired, this was understandable in view of the questions at issue. Paragraph 4 of the draft conclusions recalled that sincere and effective cooperation of management and labour was an essential element in the application of programming and planning. In a changing world compromise solutions were called for, as in the present case. The conclusions might serve as a cure for the ills of the metal trades throughout the world. Adding his thanks to those of previous speakers the speaker asked on behalf of the Workers' group that the report and draft conclusions be adopted.

The Committee unanimously adopted the report and conclusions (No. 64) concerning the role of employers' and workers' organisations in programming and planning in the metal trades. The text of the conclusions is reproduced below.

Conclusions (No. 64) concerning the Role of Employers' and Workers' Organisations in Programming and Planning in the Metal Trades [1]

The Metal Trades Committee of the International Labour Organisation,

Meeting in its Eighth Session in Geneva from 6 to 17 December 1965,

Recalling the resolution (No. 58) concerning programming techniques in the metal trades,

Bearing in mind the resolution concerning the concept of democratic decision-making in programming and planning for economic and social development, adopted by the International Labour Conference at its 48th Session (1964),

Having discussed the role of employers' and workers' organisations in programming and planning in the metal trades;

Adopts this seventeenth day of December 1965 the following conclusions:

1. Forecasting and guiding national economic development is increasingly claiming the attention of those who are responsible in whatever capacity for drawing up and putting into effect economic and social policy in the various branches of the economy, including the metal trades. To do this, methods of programming and/or planning are being used.

2. Programming and/or planning normally covers the economy as a whole. It is of particular interest to the metal trades by reason of the volume of their production, the degree of their investments, the growth in their international character, the size and skills of their workforce, their sensitivity to economic fluctuations and the fact that to a higher degree than many other industries they are subject to technological change. The ever faster pace of scientific and technological development in the metal trades, as well as measures in some areas to bring about free trade, have created and may continue to create problems of structural adjustment, modernisation and social assimilation, for which a satisfactory solution on the basis of a rising standard of living and full employment may call for a co-ordinated industrial policy.

3. While there is a clear distinction between methods involving directives to industry and methods designed as guides to enable all the participants in industry to act with a full knowledge of the over-all position, the terms " programming " and " planning " are used in the present conclusions as covering not only formalised procedures by which a government sets output goals for specific sectors of the economy but also policies intended to affect industry as a whole or certain sectors of it, in so far as these policies are deliberate, long-term and consistent. At the same time it is being increasingly realised how important it is to see that these methods of programming and/or planning should not result in preventing the undertaking from carrying on its creative activities.

4. Furthermore, the implementation of a programming and/or planning policy should not have the effect of restricting the freedom of action of employers' and workers' organisations in their relations. Their independence should always be respected. A programming and/or planning policy may, however, have an influence on their action by taking into account the requirements of such a policy, whose success largely depends on the sincere and effective co-operation of management and labour.

5. The main reason for the interest shown in methods of programming and/or planning is that they enable over-all forecasts to be made. These are an important source of information on the possible future growth of the national economy, including the metal trades. These forecasts may be useful in clarifying the situation for management and labour and in guiding their action. Programming and/or planning should always be aimed at promoting social progress and the welfare of all concerned.

6. To ensure this it is necessary for management and labour to be represented, as appropriate, by their respective organisations co-operating both with each other and with the appropriate authorities with a view to setting the general goals to be attained so as to ensure the harmonious development of the metal trades and the improvement of the working and living conditions of the workers they employ.

7. Such methods of programming and/or planning need not involve direct and mandatory intervention by the government. On the contrary, since at present all governments must have an economic and social policy, these methods may prevent intervention by the government from being made in an empirical way and allow its policy to be known in advance and carried out with coherence and continuity. Programming and/or planning should be of a scientific character and should be based on prior studies of the economic structure of different branches of industry.

8. Programming and/or planning, particularly in the metal trades, can in fact be carried out through a variety of methods, which are derived from differences in the political, economic and social structure and in the degree of development and the size of the countries concerned. It is recognised that different ideologies and methods of government and different traditions and purposes of employers' and workers' organisations may demand different approaches to effective programming and/or planning at any level. The extent of industrial development in any particular country is also an important factor.

9. Owing to prevailing social conditions, particularly in countries in the course of industrialisation, emphasis should be put on all social aspects of programming and/or planning in these countries. Improvement of workers' conditions and social benefits are necessary requisites to successful programming and/or planning goals and would ease the change from the traditional to the industrial life.

10. In countries where the economy is based wholly or in part on the principle of free enterprise, any programming and/or planning could be based on plans prepared by the separate undertakings, account being taken, where they exist, of over-all forecasts made at the national level. The successful implementation of the plans thus made, however, may call for the co-operation of management and workers, which may be obtained by procedures in conformity with the custom and practice in industrial relations in the country concerned.

11. In countries where the economy is based on public ownership of the means of production, planning is regarded as an indispensable method of running the economy. The responsibility for drawing up plans in the metal trades belongs generally to a system of economic administrative bodies ranging from the central planning body down to the level of the undertakings, all of them acting in consultation with the workers' organisations. The problem of the operational independence of undertakings in the metal trades within the structure of the plan is nevertheless receiving attention and in some cases has given rise to new methods aimed at an increased autonomy of undertakings and introducing a system of workers' participation in the management of undertakings.

12. Important conditions for successful functioning of programming and/or planning bodies are that they be convened at regular intervals and in cases of emergency and that procedures and institutions should be developed to give all concerned all information.

13. If a policy of programming and/or planning in the metal trades is to produce results, it is imperative to secure the co-operation of management and labour in this sector. It is therefore indispensable that the employers' and workers' organisations in the metal trades should be able to play a full part in drawing up, putting into effect and reviewing programming and/or planning measures at appropriate levels.

14. Suitable measures should therefore be taken, where necessary, to make arrangements to ensure such participation, for example—

(a) direct representation of undertakings and employers' and workers' organisations on the committees and bodies responsible for drawing up programmes and plans in the metal trades;

(b) participation by management and labour representatives in the metal trades on committees and bodies which have general competence in laying down national and international economic and social policy and which are therefore associated in drawing up economic and social programmes and plans of general application;

(c) agreements between employers' and workers' organisations in the metal trades aimed at social benefits for the workers.

15. It may appear desirable in some countries, particularly those in the process of industrialisation, to strengthen the structures of collective bargaining and joint consultation at the level of industry as a whole, or of particular sectors of industry, with a view to establishing certain general goals aimed at guiding the parties in their joint negotiation at the level of individual undertakings.

16. Bodies for consultation or co-operation within the undertaking and collective bargaining procedures may enable workers' representatives to make a useful contribution to the development of production programmes of undertakings and measures aimed at improving working conditions and efficient use of manpower in the metal trades. The success of this contribution largely depends on the information and consultation policy followed by the management of undertakings. When management is contemplating steps likely to affect the workforce, it should take due account of the provisions of paragraph 13 of the Termination of Employment Recommendation, 1963.

17. The conclusions (No. 55) concerning the acceleration of technological progress and its influence on the effective utilisation of manpower and the improvement of workers' income in the metal trades, adopted by the Metal Trades Committee at its Seventh Session (1962), should guide the employers' and workers' organisations participating in programming and/or planning in meeting the social effects of structural changes in the metal trades caused by technological and economic developments.

Report of the Working Party on the Effect Given to the Conclusions and Resolutions Adopted by the Metal Trades Committee at Its Previous Sessions [1]

Composition and Officers of the Working Party

1. The Working Party on the Effect Given to the Conclusions and Resolutions Adopted by the Metal Trades Committee at Its Previous Sessions was set up by the Committee at its third plenary sitting on 8 December 1965. It was composed of three titular members and three deputy members from each group.

2. The Working Party elected its officers as follows:

Chairman and Reporter: Mr. FRANDSEN (Government member, Denmark).

Vice-Chairmen: Mr. DE SAEDELEER (Employers' member, Belgium); Mr. HORSBURGH (Workers' member, Australia).

3. The Working Party held five sittings.

Terms of Reference of the Working Party

4. At the request of the Chairman the representative of the Secretary-General explained to the Working Party its terms of reference, as laid down by paragraph 4 of article 3 of the Standing Orders for Industrial and Analogous Committees. In accordance with these provisions, the Working Party was called upon—

(a) to examine the information contained in the parts of the General Report concerning the effect given to the conclusions and resolutions adopted at previous sessions;

(b) to classify the conclusions and resolutions adopted at previous sessions with the object of facilitating the examination of the effect given to them; and

(c) to indicate—

(i) the conclusions and resolutions, or parts thereof, which are no longer of current concern; and

(ii) as regards the other conclusions and resolutions, or parts thereof, those which, for the time being, would not appear to call for further information, and those on which further information is considered desirable.

5. To facilitate it in the discharge of its first task—i.e. the examination of the information concerning the effect given to the conclusions and resolutions adopted at previous sessions—the Working Party had before it the first volume of the General Report [2] which had been prepared by the Office. Part I of that Report related to the action taken in the various countries to give effect to certain conclusions which had been adopted by the Committee at previous sessions. This part of the Report was based on information which had been communicated by member States. Part II of the same Report contained information concerning the action taken by the Office to give effect to requests which had been made by the Committee.

6. To assist the Committee in the discharge of its tasks arising out of points (b) and (c) of its terms of reference, the Office had prepared a draft classification which appeared as Appendix II to the General Report.

7. In accordance with a wish which had been expressed by the Committee at its previous session the Working Party also had before it the draft of a consolidated text covering the main conclusions which had been adopted at the previous sessions of the Committee. This draft text had, as Appendix III, also been incorporated in the General Report.

[1] Adopted unanimously.

[2] See General Report: Effect Given to the Conclusions of the Previous Sessions, Report I, Item 1 (a) and (b), International Labour Organisation, Metal Trades Committee, Eighth Session, Geneva, 1965 (Geneva, I.L.O., 1965) (mimeographed).

General Discussion

8. An exchange of views took place within the Working Party on the information which a number of governments had provided concerning the effect which had been given to the conclusions and resolutions adopted at the previous sessions. Following this discussion the Working Party expressed its thanks to the governments which had provided the information which was summarised by the Office in the General Report.

9. Of the conclusions and resolutions to which effect was to be given by the Office, three received special attention on the part of the Working Party: the resolution (No. 54) concerning the use of German and Spanish at sessions of the Metal Trades Committee (Sixth Session), the conclusions (No. 56) concerning working conditions and safety in shipbuilding and ship repairing (Seventh Session) and the resolution (No. 57) concerning tripartite action regarding vocational training in the metal trades (Seventh Session).

10. A number of members stressed the difficulties which German-speaking and Spanish-speaking delegates had encountered in following and participating in the proceedings of the session; this was because some of the working documents were not published in Spanish and none were prepared in German, while no full text of the reports prepared by the Office for the Committee existed in either of these two languages. Moreover, the new membership of the Committee—which now included an appreciable number of Spanish-speaking and German-speaking countries—warranted greater facilities being made available to delegates speaking these languages. The Working Party accordingly regretted that no action had been taken on resolution No. 54, and expressed the hope that the Director-General would examine the possibilities of improving the facilities for German-speaking and Spanish-speaking delegates.

11. As regards conclusions No. 56 and resolution No. 57, the members of the Working Party noted with regret that no practical action had been taken by the Office to give effect to the requests which the Committee had made to it at the Seventh Session. The Working Party hoped that the Director-General would speed up the necessary studies so as to establish what possibilities existed for taking action on the requests presented in conclusions No. 56 and in resolution No. 57. The Working Party trusted that the Governing Body might thus have soon before it proposals for the convocation, at an early date, of a meeting of experts to prepare a model code of safety regulations for shipbuilding and ship repairing, and of a tripartite meeting of experts on vocational training in the metal trades.

Classification of the Conclusions and Resolutions Adopted by the Committee at Its Previous Sessions

12. The Working Party then considered the most appropriate way of classifying the conclusions and resolutions adopted by the Committee at its previous sessions. For this purpose it based itself on the draft classification which had been prepared by the Office. The origins of that draft lay in the classification which had been approved by the Metal Trades Committee at its Seventh Session. That classification had, however, been adapted to meet the requirements of the new Standing Orders for Industrial and Analogous Committees, and in particular the provisions setting forth the terms of reference of the Working Party on the Effect Given to the Conclusions and Resolutions Adopted by the Committee at Its Previous Sessions.

13. The Working Party first proceeded to classify the conclusions and resolutions which had been adopted by the Metal Trades Committee at its Seventh Session—i.e. Nos. 55 to 62.

14. As regards those conclusions and resolutions to which effect was to be given in the various countries the Working Party agreed to place conclusions Nos. 55, 56 and 57 in Group C of Section I, i.e. amongst the conclusions and resolutions concerning which further information is considered desirable. On the other hand, it decided to transfer resolution

No. 58 to Group A of Section I (conclusions and resolutions which are no longer of current concern).

15. As regards those texts which had been adopted at the Seventh Session of the Committee, and which called for action by the Office, the Working Party felt it appropriate to place conclusions Nos. 55 and 56, as well as resolution No. 57, in the group of conclusions and resolutions which should continue to receive attention on the part of the Office (Group B of Section II). It felt, on the other hand, that resolutions Nos. 58, 59, 60, 61 and 62 were no longer of current concern. Accordingly, it classified these five resolutions in Group A of Section II. It was understood, however, that the Office would bear in mind the view which had been expressed by the Committee in resolution No. 59 concerning intensification of efforts by the United Nations and the specialised agencies in the field of the metal trades. With a view to ensuring the complete efficacy of these efforts the Workers' members added that the employers' and workers' organisations concerned should be associated with the carrying out of the programme which was referred to in the resolution in question.

16. The conclusions and resolutions which had already been classified at the preceding session of the Committee were next considered by the Working Party, with a view to determining whether the earlier classification should be revised. With the exception of the conclusions and resolutions to which reference is made in the following paragraphs, it was decided to maintain the classification established by the Committee at the last session, as adapted by the Office, in order to bring it into conformity with the new Standing Orders for Industrial and Analogous Committees.

17. At the request of the Workers' members, who considered as very important the resolution (No. 53) concerning a reduction of hours of work in the metal trades without reduction of income, the Working Party transferred the resolution in question from Group A of Section I to Group C of the same section (texts concerning which further information is considered to be desirable). Simultaneously, it transferred those parts of the same resolution (No. 53) which concerned the Office, from Group A to Group B of Section II (texts which should continue to receive attention on the part of the Office).

18. Concerning Group B of Section I (texts concerning which no further information appears to be required for the time being), the Workers' members considered that the resolution (No. 26) concerning minimum income security was once again of very great interest. They emphasised that even if minimum income security raised no special problem at the present time in industrialised countries, the matter was a vital one in developing countries. Resolution No. 26 ought therefore to be transferred to Group C of Section I, to enable the Office to collect further information on this subject for the next session of the Committee.

19. The Employers' members were opposed to the transfer of resolution No. 26 to Group C. They referred to the resolution concerning minimum living standards and their adjustment to the level of economic growth, adopted by the International Labour Conference at its 48th Session (1964). That resolution dealt with the question of minimum income in a more explicit fashion, and at the same time in a more general way, than did resolution No. 26 of the Metal Trades Committee; moreover, the Governing Body had already approved a number of practical measures designed to give effect to the resolution of the International Labour Conference. In these circumstances it would serve no purpose to place resolution No. 26 in the group of texts concerning which further information was desired. Indeed, a request for information on this resolution would overlap with the inquiries which would be undertaken as a result of the adoption by the International Labour Conference of the resolution on the same subject.

20. Following this exchange of views, a vote was taken on the proposal of the Workers' members for the transfer of resolution No. 26 from Group B to Group C of Section I. There were three votes in favour, three votes against, and three abstentions, and the proposal thus failed of adoption. Accordingly, resolution No. 26 was retained in Group B of Section I.

Consolidated Text of Conclusions and Resolutions Adopted by the Metal Trades Committee at Its Previous Sessions

21. There was then an exchange of views on the Consolidated Text of Conclusions and Resolutions Adopted by the Metal Trades Committee at Its Previous Sessions. This combined text is reproduced hereinafter. The Working Party expressed its satisfaction with this text and thanked the Office for carrying out the considerable work involved in preparing it. The Working Party expressed the wish that the Office take appropriate measures to ensure that this text be brought to the attention of all concerned.

22. The Working Party also asked the Office to complete the Consolidated Text by incorporating in it the conclusions and resolutions which would be adopted at the current session, and to submit this completed text to the next session of the Committee.

23. The Workers' members requested that in this completed Consolidated Text the long section on human relations should be simplified and more ample quotations should be made from texts referring to problems of wages and hours of work.

Adoption of the Draft Classification

24. The Working Party, at its fifth sitting, held on 16 December 1965, unanimously adopted the Draft Classification of the Conclusions and Resolutions Adopted by the Metal Trades Committee at Its Previous Sessions.

Adoption of the Report

25. The Working Party, at its fifth sitting, held on 16 December 1965, unanimously adopted the present report.

Geneva, 16 December 1965.

(Signed) G. FRANDSEN,
Chairman and Reporter.

APPENDIX

CLASSIFICATION OF THE CONCLUSIONS AND RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED BY THE METAL TRADES COMMITTEE AT ITS PREVIOUS SESSIONS [1]

Section I. Conclusions and Resolutions Calling for Action in the Countries

Group A. Conclusions and Resolutions, or Parts Thereof, Which Are No Longer of Current Concern.

No. 6. Resolution concerning industrial relations in the metal trades (First Session).
No. 7. Resolution concerning the observance of collective agreements (First Session).
No. 10. Resolution concerning production and employment (First Session).
No. 11. Resolution concerning shortages of steel, new equipment and coal in European countries (First Session).
No. 12. Resolution concerning government expenditure on capital goods, consumers' goods and services (First Session).
No. 13. Resolution concerning unemployment insurance and social security (First Session).
No. 17. Resolution concerning the implementation of proposals and resolutions adopted by the Metal Trades Committee (Second Session).
No. 19. Resolution concerning regularisation of production and employment at a high level in the metal trades (Second Session).
No. 22. Resolution concerning training and promotion in the metal trades (Second Session).
No. 26. Resolution concerning minimum income security [paragraph 2] (Second Session).

[1] Adopted unanimously.

No. 37. Resolution concerning the effect given to the conclusions adopted by previous sessions of the Metal Trades Committee [paragraph 1] (Fourth Session).

No. 46. Suggestions concerning the effect given to conclusions adopted by the Metal Trades Committee (Fifth Session).

No. 50. Suggestions concerning the effect given to conclusions adopted at previous sessions of the Metal Trades Committee (Sixth Session).

No. 58. Resolution concerning programming techniques in the metal trades [paragraphs 1 and 2] (Seventh Session).

Group B. Conclusions and Resolutions, or Parts Thereof, concerning Which No Further Information Appears to Be Required for the Time Being.

No. 26. Resolution concerning minimum income security [paragraph 1] (Second Session).

No. 27. Memorandum to the Governing Body on questions concerning labour-management co-operation in the metal trades (Second Session).

No. 31. Resolution concerning technical assistance in relation to the metal trades (Third Session).

No. 34. Resolution concerning human relations in metal-working plants (Fourth Session).

No. 40. Resolution concerning consultation of employers and workers by governments on matters affecting productivity in the metal trades (Fourth Session).

No. 44. Memorandum concerning practical methods of labour-management co-operation in metal-working plants (Fifth Session).

Group C. Conclusions and Resolutions, or Parts Thereof, concerning Which Further Information Appears to Be Desirable.

No. 3. Resolution concerning special safety services and safety committees (First Session).

No. 4. Resolution concerning education and propaganda in matters of industrial safety and health (First Session).

No. 29. Resolution concerning vocational training and promotion in the metal trades (Third Session).

No. 30. Resolution concerning systems of wage calculation in the metal trades (Third Session).

No. 36. Resolution concerning productivity in the metal trades (Fourth Session).

No. 45. Memorandum concerning the regularisation of production and employment at a high level in the metal trades [paragraphs 1 to 6 (a)] (Fifth Session).

No. 49. Resolution concerning automation in the metal trades (Sixth Session).

No. 53. Resolution concerning a reduction of hours of work in the metal trades without reduction of income (Sixth Session).

No. 55. Conclusions concerning the acceleration of technological progress and its influence on the effective utilisation of manpower and the improvement of workers' income in the metal trades [except paragraphs 6 and 32] (Seventh Session).

No. 56. Conclusions concerning working conditions and safety in shipbuilding and ship repairing [except paragraphs 33, 35, 36, 37 and 39] (Seventh Session).

No. 57. Resolution concerning tripartite action regarding vocational training in the metal trades [clauses (a) and (b)] (Seventh Session).

Section II. Conclusions and Resolutions Which Call for Action on the Part of the Office

Group A. Conclusions and Resolutions, or Parts Thereof, Which Are No Longer of Current Concern to the Office.

No. 1. Resolution concerning international standardisation of statistics of accidents and occupational diseases (First Session).

No. 2. Resolution concerning international standardisation of warning signs (First Session).

No. 5. Resolution concerning I.L.O. factual survey [of the various measures taken in the different countries for the prevention of accidents and the protection of health in the metal trades] (First Session).

No. 8. Resolution concerning studies to be undertaken by the International Labour Office [on the problems of industrial relations] (First Session).

No. 9. Resolution concerning wages and freedom of association in underdeveloped regions (First Session).

No. 10. Resolution concerning production and employment (First Session).

No. 11. Resolution concerning shortages of steel, new equipment and coal in European countries (First Session).

No. 14. Resolution concerning technological improvements and hours of work (First Session).

No. 15. Resolution concerning industrially underdeveloped regions (First Session).

No . 16. Resolution concerning the definition of " metal trades " (First Session).

No. 18. Resolution concerning the definition of " metal trades " (First Session).

No. 20. Resolution concerning long-term estimates of raw materials requirements by the metal trades (Second Session).

No. 21. Resolution concerning international consultation in the metal trades (Second Session).

No. 23. Resolution concerning technological improvements and their effect on employment (Second Session).

No. 24. Resolution concerning assistance to economically underdeveloped countries (Second Session).

No. 25. Resolution concerning assistance to countries devastated by the war (Second Session).

No. 28. Resolution concerning studies to be undertaken by the Office [regarding labour-management co-operation] (Second Session).

No. 32. Resolution concerning maintenance and repair of mechanical equipment in underdeveloped countries (Third Session).

No. 33. Resolution concerning the use of sandblasting (Third Session).

No. 35. Resolution concerning human relations (Fourth Session).

No. 37. Resolution concerning the effect given to the conclusions adopted by previous sessions of the Metal Trades Committee [paragraph 2] (Fourth Session).

No. 38. Resolution concerning the date and place of the Fifth Session of the Metal Trades Committee (Fourth Session).

No. 39. Resolution concerning the agenda of the Fifth Session of the Metal Trades Committee (Fourth Session).

No. 41. Resolution concerning the agenda of the Fifth Session of the Metal Trades Committee (Fourth Session).

No. 42. Resolution concerning a study to be undertaken by the International Labour Office for the Fifth Session of the Metal Trades Committee [on the shipbuilding and ship repairing industry] (Fourth Session).

No. 43. Resolution concerning studies to be undertaken by the International Labour Office for the Fifth Session of the Metal Trades Committee [regarding a guaranteed minimum income and means of ensuring higher and more stable earnings] (Fourth Session).

No. 45. Memorandum concerning the regularisation of production and employment at a high level in the metal trades [paragraph 6 (b) to (d)] (Fifth Session).

No. 46. Suggestions concerning the effect given to conclusions adopted by the Metal Trades Committee (Fifth Session).

No. 47. Proposals concerning the agenda of the Sixth Session of the Metal Trades Committee (Fifth Session).

No. 48. Resolution concerning hours of work in the metal trades (Fifth Session).

No. 51. Resolution concerning a study of health and safety, and of welfare in relation to health and safety, of shipbuilding and ship repair workers (Sixth Session).

No. 58. Resolution concerning programming techniques in the metal trades [paragraph 3] (Seventh Session).

No. 59. Resolution concerning intensification of efforts by the United Nations and the specialised agencies in the field of the metal trades (Seventh Session).

No. 60. Resolution concerning international co-operation in dealing with social and labour questions in the metal trades in developing countries (Seventh Session).

No. 61. Resolution concerning the agenda of the Eighth Session of the Metal Trades Committee (Seventh Session).

No. 62. Resolution concerning the agenda of the Eighth Session of the Metal Trades Committee (Seventh Session).

Group B. Conclusions and Resolutions, or Parts Thereof, Which Should Continue to Receive Attention on the Part of the Office.

No. 26. Resolution concerning minimum income security [paragraph 3] (Second Session).

No. 29. Resolution concerning vocational training and promotion in the metal trades (Third Session).

No. 30. Resolution concerning systems of wage calculation in the metal trades (Third Session).

No. 52. Resolution concerning technical assistance to industrially underdeveloped countries (Sixth Session).

No. 53. Resolution concerning a reduction of hours of work in the metal trades without reduction of income (Sixth Session).

No. 54. Resolution concerning the use of German and Spanish at sessions of the Metal Trades Committee (Sixth Session).

No. 55. Conclusions concerning the acceleration of technological progress and its influence on the effective utilisation of manpower and the improvement of workers' income in the m etal trades [paragraphs 6 and 32] (Seventh Session).

No. 56. Conclusions concerning working conditions and safety in shipbuilding and ship repairing [paragraphs 33, 35, 36, 37 and 39] (Seventh Session).

No. 57. Resolutions concerning tripartite action regarding vocational training in the metal trades [clauses (c) and (d)] (Seventh Session).

Examination by the Committee of the Report, with the Draft Classification, of the Working Party on the Effect Given to the Conclusions and Resolutions Adopted by the Metal Trades Committee at Its Previous Sessions

In presenting the report of the Working Party on the Effect Given to the Conclusions and Resolutions Adopted by the Metal Trades Committee at Its Previous Sessions and the draft classification at which this Working Party had arrived, Mr. FRANDSEN (Government delegate, Denmark; Chairman and Reporter of the Working Party) stated that the sittings of the Working Party were held in a good spirit of co-operation, with the aid of the two Vice-Chairmen and its members. The information provided by governments and by the Office was clearly presented. Some remarks were made regarding the resolution (No. 54) concerning the use of German and Spanish at sessions of the Metal Trades Committee, the conclusions (No. 56) concerning working conditions and safety in shipbuilding and ship repairing, and the resolution (No. 57) concerning tripartite action regarding vocational training in the metal trades. Paragraphs 9 to 11 of the report of the Working Party contained a summary of these statements and it was hoped that the Office would give effect to the requests which had been made. The Working Party had then classified the conclusions and resolutions adopted by the Committee at its previous sessions. This classification was contained in the appendix to the report. The Working Party had unanimously adopted the report and the classification.

Mr. DE SAEDELEER (Employers' delegate, Belgium; Vice-Chairman of the Working Party) said that the Employers' members of the Working Party had noted that at this session there had been broad agreement on the classification, and pointed out that the Consolidated Text of conclusions and resolutions drawn up by the Office would be useful to all those seeking information on this matter.

Mr. HORSBURGH (Workers' delegate, Australia; Vice-Chairman of the Working Party) mentioned that in paragraph 9 of the report resolution No. 54, conclusions No. 56 and resolution No. 57 had received special attention. General draft resolutions concerning the problems dealt with in the above conclusions and prepared for submission to the Committee had been withdrawn and the Workers' members were therefore pleased to have the subjects dealt with in those drafts mentioned in the Working Party's report. In paragraph 11 it was noted with regret that no practical action had been taken by the Office regarding these matters and it was hoped that the Office would expedite its work on these problems.

The Committee unanimously adopted the report and the Classification of the Conclusions and Resolutions Adopted by the Metal Trades Committee at Its Previous Sessions.

Consolidated Text of Conclusions and Resolutions Adopted by the Metal Trades Committee at Its Previous Sessions

I. Regularisation of Production and Employment

Regularisation of Production

1. Primary objectives [of the Metal Trades Committee] are to contribute by all means possible to improving the standard of living of the workers in the metal trades and to seek effective solutions for the industrial problems facing the metal trades. It is important to take measures to prevent the occurrence of slumps and thereby help to ensure social peace in the metal trades. The principal means for attaining these objectives is to achieve the regularisation of production and of employment at a high level. For this purpose it is necessary to undertake studies within each country based on factual material of the various problems affecting the metal trades, such as—

(a) co-ordination of production;

(b) modernisation of plant and equipment;

(c) provision of raw materials;

(d) relation of production and consumption levels;

(e) maintenance of effective demand;

(f) development of standardisation of parts;

(g) formulation of appropriate financial and credit policies (II/19).[1]

2. The Metal Trades Committee emphasises the world-wide necessity of achieving maximum production and employment in the metal trades. In order to achieve this it is necessary greatly to increase production, so as to permit of a high level of consumption, the payment of high wages and the stabilisation of employment at a high level (I/10 and IV/36).

3. Sharp economic crises resulting in widespread unemployment are avoidable through appropriate action. Sustained full employment can be built only on a solid foundation of adequate consumer purchasing power, of steadily rising living standards, of greater economic security, especially for the lower income groups, and of rapid economic development of undeveloped countries. Underlying economic factors affecting the demand for and production of metal trades products, though in their more technical aspects unsuitable for detailed discussion by the Metal Trades Committee, are of fundamental importance in connection with any measures which may be taken to maintain a high level of employment in the metal trades. Great importance is attached to the maintenance of a level of demand for goods and services in general, and for metal products in particular, which is high enough to overcome unemployment. Great importance is attached also to measures to promote the rapid growth of real income and the expansion of employment. Measures taken to promote these objectives should, however, take into account the danger of inflation in certain circumstances. Whenever there is a danger of the development of unemployment in metal industries manufacturing consumer goods, the Committee believes it to be important that consideration should be given in good time to the possibilities of stimulating consumers' demand for metal products by such means as (i) price reductions, which may be made possible through increasing productivity or, in appropriate cases, through reducing taxes on the sale or use of consumers' durable goods; (ii) measures to increase the volume and stability of consumer credit for the purchase of metal trades products. With a view to stabilising the investment demand for metal products coming from private enterprise, all undertakings which invest in machines and equipment, and especially large undertakings, should carefully examine the possibilities of planning their investment programmes over a period of years in such a way that these investment programmes can be carried out even if there are minor adverse changes in business conditions, and in any case will not be revised downward without careful consideration. Careful consideration should be given to the possibilities of timing purchases and investments by governments and local authorities in such a way that they have the effect of counteracting, so far as possible, fluctuations in private demand. Such timing of public expenditure requires appropriate administrative and financial measures, some of which are set forth in the Public Works (National Planning) Recommendation (No. 51) adopted by the International Labour Conference in 1937. The Committee notes that expenditure on machinery and equipment is likely to have a more direct impact on employment in the metal trades than would other types of public expenditure (V/45).

4. Governments should study the planning of their expenditures on capital goods, consumers' goods and services, so as to concentrate these in times of declining employment, and thus help to hold unemployment in the metal trades to a minimum during such periods (I/12).

5. It is important that everything possible should be done to remove obstacles to free international trade so that full benefit may be derived from technological progress, which is essential for the achievement of peace and prosperity in all countries. In this way, a practical contribution can be made to the abolition of unemployment and to the stabilisation of employment in all countries. Differences in wages between different countries should not, however, be allowed to become a major factor in international competition, which should rather be based on such factors as natural resources and technical skill (V/45).

6. Continuity of demand and national and international co-operation in assuring a continuous flow of raw materials, supplies, equipment and services are among the essential requirements of maximum production and employment. The governments concerned should study their existing policies relating particularly to taxation, industrial relations, government expenditure and foreign trade with the object of encouraging efficient production and expanding employment (I/10 and IV/36).

7. Governments of the countries represented on the Metal Trades Committee [should] consider the advisability of setting up, where such bodies do not already exist, suitable agencies to gather the necessary data, analyse them and formulate recommendations regarding the problems affecting the metal trades for the information of the country as a whole and for the guidance of the industry and of the appropriate governmental bodies (II/19).

Employment

Regularisation of Employment.

8. Security for the worker, particularly from intermittent employment, is in the interests of good labour relations. It is of the utmost importance to provide wherever and whenever possible steady employment and income for the wage earners in the industry. Stabilisation of employment, security for the worker and greater economies and efficiency in production wherever possible are objectives of mutual concern to employer and worker—each having a genuine responsibility for attempting to stabilise operations within a plant or industry so as to advance the general economic security of the country (II/26).

Organisation of the Employment Market.

9. An effective programme to overcome unemployment depends to a great extent on the organisation of the employment market. A well-organised employment market requires an efficient employment service, provision for vocational guidance and vocational training, measures to facilitate the movement of workers to jobs elsewhere, and, in some cases, measures to encourage the establishment of new industries or undertakings in areas of substantial unemployment. Measures to improve the organisation of the employment market in any of these ways should be planned and implemented after joint consultation between government officials, employers and workers (V/45).

Employment Services and Manpower Budgets.

10. The Committee calls attention to the Employment Service Convention (No. 88) and the Employment Service Recommendation (No. 83) adopted by the International Labour Conference at its 31st Session (San Francisco, 1948), which set out many of the necessary conditions for the successful operation of employment services (V/45).

11. Improvements should be made, where necessary, in employment service organisation designed to ensure that information regarding suitable vacancies is promptly made available to displaced workers, to workers threatened with displacement and, where customary, to their organisations (IV/36).

12. The Committee emphasises in particular the importance of manpower budgets (Employment Service Recommendation, [1948,] Part III). These are statements, drawn up from surveys, of labour requirements and availabilities in different industries, occupations and regions. Manpower budgets should take into account not only existing vacancies and applications for employment; they should also consider forecasts of the employment opportunities by government officials and employers' and workers' organisations. The making of manpower budgets will be facilitated if employers notify the employment service of impending lay-offs as far in advance as possible (V/45).

13. The successful preparation and implementation of programmes against unemployment require accurate, comprehensive and up-to-date statistical information (V/45).

Relocation of Workers.

14. A manpower budget may also show that there is substantial unemployment in some regions of the country concerned while there are vacancies in other regions. If these conditions are thought to justify the social costs involved in the movement of workers between regions, the employment service should facilitate the movement of workers (i) by supplying financial aid as is suggested in the Employment Service Recommendation [,1948] (Paragraph 17), and (ii) by supplying information on housing, costs of living, schools and other economic and social conditions in the regions concerned (V/45).

15. Governments and employers' and workers' organisations in the metal trades [should] take all possible measures with a view to ... arranging for the transfer of workers when rendered necessary by technological developments or other reasons with the agreement of the workers concerned and, where the workers are represented by their organisations, in consultation with such organisations (II/22).

Aid to Depressed Areas.

16. In order to prevent the growth of depressed areas it may be necessary in some instances for governments, local authorities and private groups to assist industries to establish themselves in such areas in order to provide job opportunities as well as to preserve resources already developed by the community, such as hospitals, cultural centres, social centres, etc. (VI/49).

17. In cases where the social costs of movement of workers in large numbers from one region to another would be substantial, governments, on the basis of recommendations from national employment services, may consider the desirability of adopting measures to encourage investment for the establishment of new industries or undertakings in regions of heavily localised unemployment (V/45).

II. Training

General

18. Governments and employers' and workers' organisations in the metal trades [should] take all possible measures with a view to making the best use of the physical and professional aptitudes of the workers, by means of vocational guidance, apprenticeship schemes, accelerated training and employee promotion (II/22).

Vocational Guidance

19. Vocational guidance programmes are designed primarily to give the individual worker, as a result of his free and voluntary choice, the fullest possible opportunity for personal development and satisfaction from his work. Vocational guidance programmes can contribute to the efficient organisation of the employment market by assisting young persons in the choice of their first occupations and by likewise assisting adults who desire to change their occupation in their choice of a new occupation. Such assistance should take into account individual capabilities in relation to existing occupational opportunities (V/45).

20. Vocational guidance on an individual basis should be available to assist young people in selecting training courses and choosing an occupation. Such guidance should be given by competent bodies which must be in a position to provide the necessary information concerning present and future possibilities of employment and qualifications required in an industrial society undergoing rapid transformation (VII/55).

21. There should be adequate arrangements for vocational guidance both in schools and subsequently, on the lines laid down in the Vocational Guidance Recommendation, 1949. In particular it is recommended that training for skilled metal trades should be preceded by or include a probationary period during which the apprentice should have the benefit of vocational guidance in order to see whether he is suited for the particular trade of his choice and, if appropriate, to guide him to another trade for which he is more suited (III/29).

22. Vocational guidance services should be established or expanded in order to provide suitable advice to young workers and to displaced workers on the scope of training which will most likely equip them for employment opportunities existing in their area (VI/49).

23. In connection with measures taken to promote productivity, full consideration should be given to the adoption of the best methods for the selection and placement of workers (IV/36).

Vocational Training

24. Vocational training for the metal trades should be systematic and thorough and should be organised in accordance with the principles set out in the Vocational Training Recommendation, 1939, and the Apprenticeship Recommendation, 1939.[1] Such training should be promoted in each country in which such trades exist, taking into account the special characteristics of the metal trades, the requirements of the various branches of the metal trades and of the individual undertakings and the need of the workers for facilities for both training and promotion. There should be co-operation between employers and workers in the preparation of model schemes on the basis of which training in undertakings should be organised. Employers' and workers' organisations should co-operate closely with the State in the preparation of training schemes organised or supervised by the public authorities (III/29).

25. Programmes for vocational training are of the greatest importance to the organisation of the employment market. A manpower budget may show that there are vacancies in some occupations while, at the same time, there may be unemployment in other occupations. In these conditions programmes for vocational training and retraining, while always necessary factors in social progress, become of immediate importance in overcoming unemployment. The Committee calls attention to the Vocational Training Recommendations (Nos. 57 and 88) adopted by the International Labour Conference in 1939 and 1950. As is provided in the 1950 Recommendation (paragraph 5 (3)), vocational training facilities should be sufficiently developed to include appropriate arrangements for initial, refresher, supplementary and upgrading training (V/45).

[1] In 1962 the International Labour Conference adopted the Vocational Training Recommendation, which superseded the Vocational Training and Apprenticeship Recommendations, 1939 and 1950.

26. In connection with measures taken to promote productivity, full consideration should be given to the provision of adequate training facilities, to match the requirements of the various kinds of jobs and the various categories of workers (IV/36).

27. In carrying out its task of international information on vocational guidance and training, the International Labour Office should take account of the special needs of the metal trades (III/29).

28. It is noted that the International Labour Office is already taking action to facilitate the movement of trainees from country to country to gain more experience in their particular trades, and it is strongly urged that particular attention should be given in this respect to the metal trades (III/29).

29. The Governing Body of the International Labour Office is invited to consider convening at appropriate intervals tripartite meetings of experts in vocational training in the metal trades, drawn in respect of employers and workers from their competent international organisations, to advise on all matters relating to programmes of training in the metal trades, taking into account the provisions of the Vocational Training Recommendation, 1962, and the need for programmes to be adapted in the light of technological progress (VII/57).

Apprenticeship

30. Apprenticeship, as defined in Paragraph 1 of the Apprenticeship Recommendation, 1939, should be applied to metal trades in which a high degree of skill and experience is necessary and can only be acquired on the lines of a methodical and thorough apprenticeship training. The underlying principle of all apprenticeship training should be to give each apprentice a thorough training and experience of the work of his trade, capable of safeguarding his occupational adaptability in adult life. The trades in which apprenticeship is applied should be designated in each country, taking into account the degree of skill and the length of the period of practical training required. It is suggested that a classification of trades should be prepared in each country, indicating and defining the various metal trades. Where apprenticeship training is carried out in undertakings on production work, it is desirable that, whenever possible, each undertaking should provide special apprenticeship workshops. Where apprenticeship training is provided in vocational training centres unconnected with the workshops of undertakings, part of such apprenticeship may be spent in the workshops of an undertaking. Such training centres should be adequately supplied with the necessary equipment, machine tools and materials, and the conditions of training should approximate as closely as possible and practicable to those in workshops of the undertakings for which the apprentices are being trained. Whether the training is provided in workshops or in vocational training centres, apprentices should as far as possible and practicable be encouraged to take advantage of all the facilities provided for further education and technical education, both in day classes and in their own time at evening classes. Apprenticeship training should be supervised by competent supervisors thoroughly experienced in the work of the trade or industry and also in the best methods of training and supervision. The duration of apprenticeship may vary not only as between countries because of variations in the school-leaving age and other factors, but also as between different trades in the same country, according to the age of recruitment, the skill and degree of physique required in the different trades and other circumstances. Where provision is made for the organisation of examinations and the issue of certificates of proficiency, such certificates should have validity throughout the country concerned (III/29).

Training of Adults and Retraining

31. Apprenticeship should remain the basic form of training in the industry, but it may be necessary, in the event of a shortage of skilled workers, to train adult workers. Adult workers may be trained either in undertakings or in special training centres (III/29).

Training of Supervisors and Instructors

32. Special attention should be paid to the training of supervisors and instructors in the exercise of their supervisory and instructional functions. This training should include instruction in psychology, methods of instruction, human relations and work methods. The training should be provided both before and after the persons concerned are appointed to positions as supervisors or instructors (III/29).

33. Governments and employers' and workers' organisations in the metal trades [should] take all possible measures with a view to—

(a) adopting the most suitable methods for training supervisory personnel;

(b) considering programmes where possible for the practical and educational training of selected workers and personnel for technical and supervisory duties by arranging for them to attend courses in other countries (II/22).

Training Methods and Programmes

34. Training methods in the metal trades should be periodically re-examined with a view to adapting them to the most up-to-date teaching methods and to new industrial processes and techniques. Model teaching programmes should be drawn up in each country for apprenticeship and, if appropriate, for the training of adult workers in the metal trades (III/29).

Training and Promotion

35. Suitable arrangements should be made to ensure training for workers to enable them to be promoted to more highly skilled jobs and to positions of greater responsibility, bearing in mind the need for ensuring plant efficiency and at the same time the workers' need for promotion opportunities. Facilities should be granted, in accordance with the possibilities and the needs of each undertaking, to workers in employment likely to qualify for promotion to attend training courses. Promotion of workers is the responsibility of the employer. However, it would be desirable that there should be co-operation between employers' and workers' organisations to lay down general rules governing the procedure for the advancement of workers to all non-managerial functions (III/29).

III. Conditions of Work

Hours of Work

36. The Governing Body of the International Labour Office is invited to consider the advisability of calling upon governments to devote their full attention to the problem of a reduction of hours of work in the metal trades without reduction of income (VI/53).

Income Security

37. Income security, if, when and wherever economically possible, is in the interest of sound labour relations. There should be continued studies of the problem of income security which would deal with the problem on a realistic basis that would safeguard the interests of the workers, employers and consumers in all countries represented on the Committee. To be constructive and lasting, any solution of this problem must be based on a realistic consideration of industrial development, economic conditions, existing legislation, current practices and the benefits of unemployment and other social insurance schemes. In connection with the study of income security there should be a review of existing legislation in such pertinent fields as social insurance and in minimum wages and hours, in order that the interrelationship may be evaluated to the end of co-ordinating their effects (II/26).

38. Governments should establish minimum social security, including unemployment benefits, so as to maintain the purchasing power of the workers at a reasonable level and for reasonable periods. Where this is not the practice, other arrangements to achieve this end should be considered jointly by employers and workers, such as severance pay, allowances during retraining, etc. (VI/49).

39. Governments should introduce and where necessary extend schemes of unemployment compensation and insurance and plans for ensuring the social security of the workers and their families (I/13).

40. It would be desirable for the [International Labour] Conference to consider the possibility of adopting guaranteed wage plans if, when and wherever economically possible, preferably through the processes of free collective bargaining, which will meet the varying conditions of different countries and of different segments of the metal trades. Any guaranteed wage plan is self-defeating, however, if it involves an employer in additional costs to the point where his ability to adjust becomes unduly limited (II/26).

Job Classification and Systems of Wage Payments

41. A classification of jobs in each branch of the metal trades should be made in each case where this is possible, and these jobs should be placed in a limited number of separate wage-rate categories on a plant-to-plant basis by agreement between the employers and workers concerned, and on a regional or national basis by agreement between organisations of employers and workers. A minimum rate should be established and secured for each category. The variety of bonuses should be limited as much as possible, on condition that a reduction in their number does not result in the elimination of social benefits provided by legislation or by agreement. All guaranteed minimum rates for piece and bonus workers should be fixed on the basis of the minimum rates mentioned above. All piece and bonus rates should be set on the basis of rules agreed by the employers and workers concerned in the case of bargaining on a plant-to-plant basis, and by the employers' and workers' organisations concerned in the case of bargaining on a regional or national basis (III/30).

42. Systems of wage calculation are in need of simplification in many cases, particularly in respect of the wage structure and of some systems of payment by results. This problem arises mainly—(a) where workers are commonly paid by results; (b) where there is both time and piece work; (c) where the wage structure is complex; (d) where many supplementary bonuses are paid; or (e) where a large number of administrative details affecting the calculation of wages are imposed on employers by laws and regulations (III/30).

43. The pay slips which workers receive should be as simple as possible, consistent with the inclusion of all the information necessary to enable workers readily to understand how their wages are calculated. At the time of engagement, the method of calculation of wages should be explained by the manager of the undertaking or his deputy to the workers concerned in such a manner as to avoid subsequent friction between employers and workers (III/30).

44. A limited number of systems of calculating time rates or piece rates which are simple enough to be understood by all workers to whom they apply should be worked out and adopted by the organisations of employers and workers in the different countries concerned (II/26).

45. In connection with measures taken to promote productivity, full consideration should be given to the adoption of methods of calculation of wages such that, whatever the system of payment may be, the worker may easily understand what sum is due to him (IV/36).

46. Job classification and job evaluation systems, where these exist, should be re-examined in order to take account of the new job requirements. In this connection consideration should be given to a new weighting of factors reflecting the new job requirements. Investigation should also be made of such matters as increased mental tension, perceptual fatigue and " lonely work ", as well as the additional responsibilities involved in the supervision and upkeep of equipment and machines. Existing time and motion study schemes and incentive methods should be re-examined with a view to their modification or elimination where the new processes no longer make existing methods appropriate. Consideration should be given to the need for wage adjustments to reflect accurately the revised requirements of each job (VI/49).

IV. Safety and Health

General

47. Special services should be organised by the employers and joint committes composed of employers' and workers' representatives set up in the undertakings belonging to the metal trades group to promote the prevention of accidents and the protection of health in the plants (I/3).

48. The different countries should use all suitable means, including posters, broadcasts, films, conferences, lectures, competitions, etc., to encourage and promote education respecting accident prevention and protection of health in industry, both among employers and workers (I/4).

49. In connection with measures taken to promote productivity full consideration should be given to all measures necessary for the safety, health and welfare of workers (IV/36).

Working Conditions and Safety in Shipbuilding and Ship Repairing

Responsibility.

50. The prevention of accidents and the protection of the workers' health must be the concern of public authorities and institutions and of all engaged in the shipbuilding and ship repairing industry, since occupational accidents and diseases as well as the human suffering and loss of earning capacity for the workers injured are not only to be deplored from the point of view of the worker and his family, but also from the point of view of the community as a whole, and the following measures are therefore necessary.

Legislation and Regulations.

51. Provisions established by legislation or regulations or in any other way according to national practice must lay down minimum safety measures, which should provide a general framework for the application of safety schemes.

52. These provisions must be kept up to date in order to take into account changes and technical developments.

53. The special hazards of the shipbuilding and ship repairing industries should be the subject of legislative provisions or regulations, or other equally effective measures.

54. Every worker employed in shipbuilding and ship repairing operations should be covered by the laws or other measures relating to this type of work.

55. For the purpose of securing the enforcement of legal provisions relating to the safety and protection of health of workers in shipbuilding and ship repairing and of investigating the effects of processes, materials and methods of work on the health and safety of workers, there should be a system of adequate labour inspection in conformity with the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947, and the Recommendation of the same year.

Safety Organisations in Shipyards.

56. The prime responsibility for organising safety and health in shipyards and ship repairing operations must be fully accepted by the employers, and workers must co-operate in full so that the safety arrangements may be fully effective in each undertaking.

57. Management, including where appropriate dock or harbour authorities, shipowners or shipmasters, must ensure that workplaces, working processes and the equipment used are safe and that the safety regulations are known and carried out. When work is done by subcontractors, the management of the subcontracting undertakings must also be subject to the safety regulations and accept responsibility for the safety and health of the workers engaged in such operations.

58. The provision of protective clothing and equipment as required by legislation or regulations is also the responsibility of the employer.

59. Considerations of production and urgency must not be allowed to prejudice the safety and health of workers.

60. The Occupational Health Services Recommendation, 1959, should be applied in the shipbuilding and ship repairing industry. In addition, properly qualified safety officers should be appointed to see that safety measures are applied and to exercise supervision in this field.

61. Safety committees to apply and to co-ordinate safety measures should be set up in each shipyard as an effective means of improving safety conditions. Such committees should include representatives of management and elected representatives of workers.

62. Safety measures in small shipyards, suited to their particular conditions, should be organised as far as possible on the same principles as for large shipyards.

Training of Personnel in Safety.

63. The management of shipyards should ensure that all supervisory staff are sufficiently aware of their responsibilities with regard to safety and health and should give them appropriate training in this respect so that the workers may be made fully aware of the precautions they should take in performing their work.

64. The necessary measures should be taken to ensure to workers appropriate training in order that they may become safety-conscious and carry out their work while conforming to the regulations and sound safety practices. This training should also include training in the use and maintenance in good condition of safety equipment.

65. Young people and new entrants to shipbuilding and ship repairing should have adequate training during working hours at no economic disadvantage to the workers concerned so that they may become familiar with the hazards they will meet and the protective measures required.

66. Adequate training should also be provided when new materials, machines or equipment are introduced so that all concerned may be instructed in the changing safety requirements consequent on technological change and the building of more modern types of ships.

67. Training in safety should take account of the level of education of workers and any language difficulties which may arise.

68. The high professional qualifications for safety engineers and factory doctors require appropriate training at technical schools and universities and the promotion of further studies where made necessary by the progress of science and technology.

Working Conditions.

69. It is necessary to apply the knowledge gained from experience and from scientific and technical research to facilitate the adaptation of environmental conditions to the capacities and needs of the workers, if optimum conditions of safety and health at work are to be achieved.

70. It must be recognised that reasonable working hours, appropriately spaced rest days, necessary pauses during working hours (especially in the case of arduous and dangerous work), as well as a reasonable workload, are an integral part of any accident prevention programme.

71. Working methods, jobs and technical installations should be organised in such a way as to prevent accidents.

72. Measures should be taken to ensure as far as possible the protection of workers against bad weather and to provide them with a suitable working environment.

Research.

73. It is desirable that research into work psychology and physiology should be further developed, special attention being given to the application of such research to the special problems of the shipbuilding and ship repairing industry.

The Role of Technical Safety and Health Institutions.

74. Technical safety and health institutions have an important role to play in making the results of their research activities available to all concerned in shipbuilding and ship repairing.

The Role of Employers' and Workers' Organisations.

75. Employers' organisations have an important role to play in giving every assistance in the preparation of legislation and other measures for the promotion of safety and health and in keeping management fully advised not only of their legal obligations, but also of all measures which would improve safety organisation.

76. Employers' organisations should collect the statistics of occupational accidents and diseases from their members and examine such statistics so that each undertaking may be shown how it stands in comparison with others and how it could improve its position.

77. Employers' organisations should circulate all material relating to safety and health and keep their members continuously informed of new techniques in accident prevention.

78. Employers' organisations should consult with their members and with all other organisations concerned with safety and health so that the widest possible information on this subject may be available to all who work in the industry.

79. Workers' organisations, on their side, have an important part to play in giving all necessary assistance in the preparation of legislation, regulations or safety codes. They should take positive steps to encourage strict discipline among their members in regard to safe working practices, and furnish their members, as far as possible, with all information on measures which could promote safety and health.

Collaboration.

80. There should be full collaboration at all levels between the authorities, safety institutions, including research centres, and employers' and workers' organisations on all aspects of safety and health.

81. National safety committees or other appropriate committees at the national level covering the shipbuilding and ship repairing industry as a whole should be set up in each country. These committees would have the task of improving occupational safety and health and advising the authorities in the drawing up of adequate safety measures and in their application and supervision. These committees should comprise representatives of employers' and workers' organisations, with the participation of governments as necessary.

International Action.

International Regulations.

82. The Governing Body is invited—

(a) to request the International Labour Office to convene meetings of experts with a view to the preparation of a model code of safety regulations in conformity with the outline given in the appendix and embodying the present conclusions, without prejudice to any standards already adopted by the International Labour Conference;

(b) to examine, in the light of the conclusions reached by the expert committees referred to above, the desirability of placing on the agenda of a session of the International Labour Conference the question of safety and health in the shipbuilding and ship repairing industry;

(c) to request the International Labour Office to give immediate attention to hazards such as, for example, degasification of ships, liquefied gases, explosion risks, work in confined spaces, temporary electrical installations and radiation risks due to nuclear propulsion.

Accident Statistics.

83. In order to take remedial action in areas where it is necessary, it is important to have accurate and nationally and internationally comparable statistics in order to establish the causes of accidents. Consequently, it is necessary to standardise the form in which accidents are reported, collected and summarised so that there may be a common basis of comparison.

84. The Governing Body is invited to request the International Conference of Labour Statisticians to prepare and adopt uniform standards and requirements for reporting injuries, sickness and diseases arising out of employment on shipbuilding and ship repair work, on a comparable basis.

85. The Governing Body is further invited to request governments to ensure that statistics and relevant reports are forwarded to the International Labour Office.

Circulation of Information.

86. The International Labour Office, through its competent safety bodies (the Occupational Safety and Health Division [Branch] or the International Occupational Safety and Health Information Centre) has an important part to play in all aspects of safety and particularly in the following fields:

(a) circulation to interested countries of a comparison of the legislative measures or regulations which affect safety in shipbuilding and ship repairing, whether such measures are of general application to the whole of industry or only to shipbuilding and ship repairing;

(b) circulation of the summary of such statistics so collected to interested countries and of all information of interest to safety which may result from an examination of these statistics;

(c) circulation in as concise a form as possible of all information, including safety manuals, whether of a general or particular character, relating to safety training, research and education for the benefit and guidance of safety institutions and safety personnel in general.

87. Governments, employers' and workers' organisations and other bodies interested in safety and health matters in the shipbuilding and ship repairing industry are urged to encourage wide dissemination of relevant information collected and published by the International Occupational Safety and Health Information Centre of the International Labour Office.

Technical Assistance.

88. For the introduction and implementation of occupational safety and health measures, for the inspection and establishment of safety bodies in countries in the course of industrialisation or in other countries desirous of such aid, the I.L.O., in co-operation with experts, employers' and workers' organisations, should make technical assistance available.

Points to Be Included in a Model Code.

89. The model code to be prepared by the meeting of experts referred to [in the conclusions concerning working conditions and safety in shipbuilding and ship repairing] should deal with the following points:

1. (a) Scope and responsibilities:
   (i) scope of the regulations;
   (ii) determination of persons responsible for safety under various circumstances, in particular in the case of employees of subcontractors and in the case of work on board a ship which is not owned by the shipyard;
   (iii) respective duties of the employer and the worker;
   (b) means of access:
   (i) to ships under construction;
   (ii) to dry docks;
   (iii) to ships at dockside or in wet or dry docks;
   (iv) to holds of ships;
   (c) ladders (in cases not covered by (b));
   (d) staging (including suspended stagings): protection against falls of persons or objects;
   (e) protective measures in dry docks: fencings and rails;
   (f) ways of covering openings such as hatchways and manholes;
   (g) lifting gear and other means of handling and transport;
   (h) other machinery;
   (i) hand tools;
   (j) electrical equipment:
   (i) permanent;
   (ii) temporary;
   (k) welding operations:
   (i) oxy-acetylene;
   (ii) electric;
   (l) precautions against asphyxia, poisoning and explosions:
   (i) against shortage of oxygen;
   (ii) against toxic emanations;
   (iii) against flammable gases or vapours;
   (iv) against dangerous dusts;
   (v) in handling dangerous substances;
   (vi) particular precautions in the maintenance and repair of petroleum and gas tankers;
   (m) precautions against occupational diseases; noise abatement to prevent occupational deafness;
   (n) fire prevention and fire fighting;
   (o) lighting of workplaces:
   (i) permanent lighting of construction yards, docksides and slipways;
   (ii) temporary lighting inside ships under construction or repair;
   (p) housekeeping;
   (q) individual protective equipment;
   (r) prohibition of employment of young persons in specific jobs;
   (s) safety services and safety officers;
   (t) medical centres and first-aid posts;
   (u) sanitary facilities.
2. Inspection:
   (a) effective safety inspection;
   (b) penalties for violations.

3. Measures to take account of physiological factors:
   (a) fatigue relief;
   (b) periodical medical re-examination;
   (c) special risk prevention;
   (d) weather protection.
4. Measures to take account of psychological factors, particularly by creating and maintaining safety-mindedness in shipyards:
   (a) safety training for workers:
      (i) during apprenticeship;
      (ii) upon engagement;
      (iii) at the workplace;
      (iv) upon introduction of new technical methods or machinery;
      (v) for specific occupations;
      (vi) training for employees assuming particular responsibilities with regard to safety;
      (vii) training for first-aid officers;
   (b) propaganda in the undertaking, safety campaigns and competitions.
5. Organisation of safety:
   (a) role of shipyard managements:
      (i) top management responsibility in safety questions;
      (ii) works rules: their usefulness, items to be covered;
      (iii) safety services and safety officers: efficiency of the system and value of applying it universally;
      (iv) functions of supervisors;
   (b) collaboration between management and workers and trade unions: safety committees (composition, functions, efficiency) and safety representatives;
   (c) medical services, first aid and rescue;
   (d) organisation of safety in small shipyards, in dockside repair work, and repair or alteration work aboard ships (VII/56).

V. Labour-Management and Human Relations

Labour-Management Relations

Introduction.

90. The initiative on matters concerning industrial relations affecting the whole of industry should be properly left to the International Labour Conference. However, industry-wide regulations of the methods of collaboration between employers and workers need to be based on the practice and on the experience acquired in each industry, and the expression of the point of view of the metal trades on this subject would represent a useful contribution to the work of the International Labour Conference (II/27).

Freedom of Association.

91. At the present time it is opportune to recall one of the fundamental principles of the Declaration of Philadelphia, the Charter of the International Labour Organisation, which proclaims freedom of expression and the right of association. This principle implies for the employers and workers of the metal trades the absolute right to form themselves freely into organisations, whether federations or confederations, without previous authorisation, or to join the organisation which they prefer. This absolute right should extend to all, without distinction of sex, race or religious belief, and its exercise should not involve victimisation. The governments of States Members of the International Labour Organisation should be asked to consider the repeal of any legislation which may prejudice the right of association reaffirmed above, and guarantee this right either by legislation or otherwise (I/6).

Bodies Dealing with Social and Economic Questions.

92. The relations established between employers and workers tend more and more to cover problems of different sorts, namely—

(a) collective bargaining leading to the conclusion of collective agreements with the object of determining wage structures and wage rates, hours of work, conditions of employment, vocational training, guarantees concerning employment and dismissal, etc.;

(b) the participation of the workers, in widely different ways, either on a national or on a factory level, in matters affecting the promotion of production in the factory and the industry as a whole.

Whereas it is of the greatest importance for the industry as a whole—

(a) to satisfy the common desire of the employers and the workers to secure the prosperity of the metal trades, on which the welfare of the workers depends;

(b) to guarantee the respective rights of the parties concerned; and

(c) to avoid confusion between respective functions, and unnecessary interference;

the Committee considers that a distinction should be made between the bodies required to deal with social questions and those required to deal with questions of a purely economic or technical character (I/6).

Bargaining Units and Means of Dispute Settlement.

93. The establishment of bargaining units, units responsible for interpreting agreements and supervising their application, and units for mediation and arbitration in case of disputes arising either before or during negotiations or again during the validity of collective agreements binding on the parties [are recommended]. According to the functions which they would be required to perform, these units might be national or regional or at factory level, it being understood that the latter would in no way take the place of the organisations [which are] parties to the collective agreements (I/6 and II/27).

94. The establishment of joint committees on the factory level with the object of maintaining and developing production without restricting the prerogatives of management should also be taken into consideration (I/6 and II/27).

95. Each collective agreement when entered into should carry an appropriate clause, providing for the resolution of such differences as may arise during its currency, whether by negotiation, mediation or arbitration (I/7).

Participation at the National Level.

96. The establishment of joint national committees for the metal trades, the object of which would be to assist the industry in maintaining its maximum efficiency by a full use of its economic, human and technical resources, should be taken into consideration (I/6 and II/27).

97. The attention of governments [is drawn to] the desirability of ensuring that representatives of employers and workers and/or their organisations are invited to participate in the work of governmental bodies which may be set up to promote higher productivity (IV/40).

Consultation and Co-operation at the Level of the Undertaking.

98. The prosperity of the metal trades and the welfare of the persons employed therein depend on the establishment or maintenance of harmonious relations between employers and workers. These relations, if they are to be permanent and satisfactory, require the closest co-operation of the employers' and workers' organisations (I/6).

99. Attention is called to the Co-operation at the Level of the Undertaking Recommendation, 1952 (No. 94), which provides that appropriate steps should be taken to promote consultation and co-operation between employers and workers at the level of the undertaking on matters of mutual concern not within the scope of collective bargaining machinery, or not normally dealt with by other machinery concerned with the determination of terms and conditions of employment. While it might be difficult to establish a list of topics not within the scope of collective bargaining machinery, the following subjects are regarded as suitable, under certain circumstances, for consultation at the level of the undertaking:

(a) information on the employment situation;

(b) accident prevention;

(c) plant welfare and social facilities;

(d) hygiene;

(e) vocational training;

(f) employees' services (V/44).

100. Among the essential conditions for successful consultation and co-operation at the level of the undertaking are the following:

(a) whatever form joint consultation may take its effectiveness will depend on the genuine willingness of the parties to co-operate; the intent of the parties is more important than the particular procedure which should apply;

(b) good faith must be constantly demonstrated by all participants, particularly in showing that it is their purpose to make effective use of existing arrangements for co-operation;

(c) co-operation must not interfere with the normal functions of the organisations of employers or of the unions as representative of workers' interests;

(d) top management should be actively associated with the form of consultation and co-operation adopted, in view of its continuing responsibility in the undertaking for decisions, taking into account legislative provisions and agreements;

(e) there should be genuine two-way communication at all levels of the undertaking (V/44).

101. Loyalty, mutual respect and a sense of " teamwork " are essential to assure more efficient operations, greater productivity and a higher standard of living for all (V/44).

102. In view of the different circumstances which prevail within each country and within each industry, it is neither feasible nor desirable to formulate any single rigid code of methods of co-operation valid for all enterprises within all countries (V/44).

Human Relations

103. All workers should be treated not simply as factors in production, but as human beings whose dignity and freedom, within the framework of their rights and duties, should be respected under all circumstances. A reciprocal spirit of cordial co-operation between top management, the supervisors and the workers of an undertaking is an essential factor in creating a better human atmosphere, improving conditions of work and the well-being of all those employed in it, ensuring its good running, and increasing its production and prosperity in the general interest. A high standard of human relations between all levels in an undertaking effectively promotes the creation of this spirit of co-operation (IV/34).

104. The attention of the Governing Body of the I.L.O. is drawn to the desirability of seeking all methods of bringing about a high standard of human relations within undertakings in the metal trades (IV/34).

105. Effective co-operation in an undertaking can be considered as the practical expression of the principles of human relations and their application. Good human relations in the undertaking imply the existence of a favourable moral and psychological climate. Good human relations are inseparable from good industrial relations. In order to ensure the development of effective labour-management co-operation in undertakings of the metal trades, the employers' and workers' organisations concerned in the various countries at the national or local level should, in the first instance, agree on principles and general methods of co-operation. Co-operation at the plant level should be based on the participation of freely elected representatives of all workers (V/44).

106. The employers' and workers' organisations should be invited to take into account the following recommendations and suggestions. In particular these organisations should—

(a) study, define and promote human relations in metal-working plants;

(b) endeavour to imbue their members, by every means which they may consider appropriate, with a broad spirit of co-operation based on a sound mutual understanding;

(c) consider in particular, with a view to achieving the desired aim, provisions which may be contemplated in connection with physical conditions of work, safety and hygiene programmes, and the training of personnel (IV/34).

107. The employers' and workers' organisations should recognise the relationship existing between the well-being of the workers, the interest of the consumers, and the prosperity of the undertakings derived from an improvement in human relations (IV/34).

108. The employers in particular should accord their due importance to provisions concerning the role of the personnel service, the responsibility of the supervisory personnel, opportunities of promotion for the workers, and the exchange of information and the welfare of the personnel (IV/34).

109. The provisions in paragraph 106 (c) above could be carried out either by means of direct consultation between the management and the personnel of an undertaking, or by means of collective agreements on general lines concluded between organisations representing employers and workers, or by other appropriate means (IV/34).

110. The same recommendations should be made to top management, representatives of the workers, and all persons directly or indirectly concerned with the problem of human relations in the undertakings (IV/34).

Points for the Guidance of Employers and Workers

111. Human relations, i.e. the day-to-day relationship between all the people (workers, supervisors, members of top management) working together in a particular undertaking, require for their effective development and maintenance that, in studying, defining and promoting human relations in metal-working plants, the following points should be borne in mind, inter alia—

A. By employers and their organisations:

(1) recognition of the valuable part which the trade unions can play in improving human relations;

(2) the practical expression by top management of the conception of the workers as human beings taking part in a common enterprise;

(3) recognition of the continuing responsibility of top management for ensuring the promotion of the programme and its integration with the basic policies of the undertaking;

(4) a statement of objectives for each undertaking which can be wholeheartedly accepted both by management and by the workers;

(5) the development of suitable policies, through which this conception and the objectives of the undertaking may be implemented covering, inter alia—

(a) a sound organisational structure of the firm with clear specifications of functions, duties and responsibilities for everyone engaged in the undertaking;

(b) adequate conditions of employment: fair wages, good working conditions and the like;

(c) suitable policies for the methodical selection, placement and orientation of the workers in the undertaking;

(d) training and education for all;

(e) real and equal opportunity for advancement for all employees, with promotion from within, whenever possible, and suitable policies regarding job termination;

(f) attention to the role of supervisory personnel, to their function as representatives of top management, who are expected to explain the purposes of management to the workers and to interpret the questions and needs of workers to management;

(g) genuine two-way communication between management and workers, between individual employees, and between groups of employees at all levels of the undertaking;

(h) generally to seek every means of promoting positive co-operation in the undertaking and to seek concrete and lasting achievements of equal value for the workers and management;

(6) development of procedures and devices as part of a balanced programme to give practical effect to these policies. These include—

(a) selection procedures, and arrangements to give the new employee a friendly welcome;

(b) arrangements through meetings, talks by top management speakers, information handbooks, etc., to acquaint the new employee with his place in the undertaking, the relation of his job to the products of the undertaking, his opportunities for advancement, etc.;

(c) implementation of the policy of opportunity;

(d) development of the supervisory personnel, with particular attention to the foremen, and to their part in making human relations in the plant effective; a number of supervisory training programmes making use of discussion groups, practice sessions and other devices have been developed for this purpose;

(e) two-way communication, in particular through the use of the suggestion system and through the use of suitably selected devices, a large number of which have been given effective trial in various firms which have a sound reputation as " good places to work in ";

(f) advance information to the workers concerning all changes affecting them in any manner, thus giving them the opportunity to participate in the life of the undertaking.

B. Recognition by the employers and their organisations and by the workers and their organisations of the following principles:

(1) human relations arise from a conception of workers as people and are designed to create a sense of mutual good will and sincere co-operation among everyone in the undertaking;

(2) human relations are also a technique or an art requiring a combination of common sense and training in specialised skills on the part of those who are to put it into effect;

(3) the creation of a human atmosphere in an undertaking is a process of education; it involves the development of appropriate understandings by everyone in the plant; and this takes patience and persistence as well as skill and understanding in dealing with human beings if the final objective is to be attained (IV/34).

VI. Technological Change, Productivity and Automation

General Observations

112. A great variety of technological changes are taking place in the metal trades. These take the form—either separately or together—of mechanisation, automation, introduction of new operations, utilisation of new materials, new methods of work or new ways of organising work. The pace of these changes varies according to region, country, branch of the metal trades, undertaking and section of the same undertaking. Both pace and type of technological change vary as well according to the stage of economic development. In developing countries where technological progress appears more often through the establishment of new modern factories than through the modernisation of existing factories, the problems are fundamentally different from those arising in industrialised countries. Any conclusion concerning technological progress and its influence on the effective utilisation of manpower and the improvement of workers' income in the metal trades should, therefore, be considered in the light of the above factors (VII/55).

Considerations on Automation

113. Whether the term " automation " is taken in a narrowly defined sense, limited to such applications as integration, feedback control and computer technology, or given a wider meaning to include all forms of technical development which make automatic production more possible, it is recognised that the phenomenon does not lend itself as yet to a satisfactory delimitation as regards its application in the metal trades, that its occurrence differs in form and in extent in different sectors of the metal trades and in different countries, and according to the size of the plant, the type of product, the market for that product and other factors. Hence, it is not at this stage possible to define in precise language the actual and full meaning of the term " automation ", although the Committee recognises the fact that it may have far-reaching and important effects on all sectors of society (VI/49).

114. Automation—as is true of all forms of rapid technological change—carries with it both the possibility of helping to raise the level of productivity in the metal trades and of promoting a higher standard of living for all sectors of the community and new employment prospects which accompany these high standards, as well as the possibility of economic and social transformations and the threat of attendant uncertainties for individual workers. The degree to which these benefits will accrue to the community and the unfavourable effects be avoided or reduced will depend largely on the intelligence with which the new techniques are applied (VI/49).

115. Automation for the equipment and machine-tool producing sectors of the metal trades in the industrialised countries holds the promise of an expanding demand for products, since these sectors of the metal trades supply the overwhelming majority of the equipment and machines which all other sectors of industry and commerce require for the application of the new technology. On the other hand, these developments, while they may create new employment opportunities, will require new types of skill and may cause labour redistribution and relocation which, in some instances, may create substantial transitional problems and, in particular, problems of re-employment. Automation in its various forms and the related new devices and techniques which are being applied in industry and commerce generally, and in the metal trades in particular, may be expected to spread to different sectors of the industry and in different countries in different forms and at different rates of speed (VI/49).

Desirability of, and Distribution of the Benefits from, Technological Change and Productivity Increases

116. A prosperous and efficient enterprise is essential if security of employment, a high standard of living and social progress are to be achieved. All therefore recognise the great importance in this respect of technological improvements, new methods and efficient equipment, from which everyone must benefit on an equitable basis (V/44).

117. In the long run, technological changes bring many benefits. These include higher productivity, particularly through the more effective utilisation of resources, a rising standard of living and stepped-up economic growth. In this context, technological progress should be considered as inevitable, necessary and desirable, deserving the support of governments, employers and workers (VII/55).

118. Automation and related technological processes are being increasingly applied in the metal trades in various countries. They hold the promise of providing in time material benefits to all sectors of the population, both in reducing many elements of industrial work drudgery and in making possible a greater degree of leisure, with resulting opportunities for recreation and education to all sectors of the working population. As such, automation should be fully welcomed. However, like all large-scale and extensive technological innovations, the application of the new technology will have a marked impact on economic and social organisation of industry. It will also have various repercussions for management, for trade unions and for governments and impose on each of them new responsibilities and new tasks (VI/49).

119. Since the areas in which governments can render special assistance to industry and labour in connection with the problems arising from the new technology must generally be undertaken for the benefit of the community as a whole, the Metal Trades Committee has taken particular note of the measures suggested by the International Labour Conference in the resolution concerning automation which it adopted at its 39th Session (Geneva, 1956) to be taken on the national level. These apply both to measures for governments' attention as well as to measures which are for the attention of employers' and workers' organisations and, where appropriate, in co-operation with the governmental authorities concerned; they are intended to minimise the impact of automation and to ensure that the maximum benefits flow to all from its widespread adoption by industry (VI/49).

120. The purpose of applying automation and other technological developments to industrial processes in the metal trades is to raise productivity and generally to improve the standard of living. The benefits resulting from increased productivity should be fairly shared among all sectors of the population and thus contribute to the general welfare of the community, and bring to the workers a higher standard of living, greater leisure and wider opportunities for education (VI/49).

121. The proper goals of social, political and economic policy are to achieve full employment and to ensure steady progress towards higher living standards, security and dignity for all. Higher productivity in the metal trades can make a substantial contribution to these ends. The benefits of higher productivity should be equitably distributed between labour, capital and consumers (V/45).

122. Any benefits resulting from increased productivity should contribute to the general welfare of the community through a reduction in the prices of consumer goods, and bring to the workers a higher standard of living and better working conditions (IV/36).

123. In view of the advantages which may follow from increased productivity in the metal trades, including—

(1) larger supplies both of consumer goods and of capital goods at lower prices;

(2) opportunities for higher earnings;

(3) opportunities for improvements in working conditions, including the lightening of heavy labour; and

(4) a strengthening of the economic structure;

employers and all categories of workers should co-operate to bring about higher levels of productivity (IV/36).

124. It needs to be recognised that the essential end of technological progress—the general welfare—can only be achieved if the gains resulting from higher productivity are shared equitably by employers, workers and the community at large. The application of the following methods—either separately or through a combination of several of them—might serve as a basis for the equitable sharing of the fruits of technological progress. This might take the form of—

(a) the possibility of products of better quality at lower prices being made available to all;

(b) an increase in workers' income;

(c) an improvement of social security benefits;

(d) improvement in conditions of work.

The degree to which and the form in which these various improvements would be provided to workers in the metal trades should be determined by the situation and general policy prevailing in each country (VII/55).

125. While it is agreed that all members of the community should benefit from the gains resulting from technological progress, an equitable sharing of these gains will not necessarily take place automatically. Basically, the economic and social goals of workers, employers and governments in each country should determine the way in which the gains from technological progress are distributed. In the absence of an equitable sharing, the broad goals of a dynamic and expanding economy will not be realised (VII/55).

126. In the industrialised regions or nations the primary problem is to ensure that all groups in the community share equitably in the benefits of technological progress. It is of particular importance that the effects of technological progress do not lead to hardships and undue burdens for certain workers and other members of the community (VII/55).

127. All appropriate measures should be taken to avoid unemployment as a result of increased productivity (V/45).

128. In the short run technological changes may bring benefits, but often bring problems such as adjustments for workers, underemployment and unemployment. In many countries, governments and employers' and workers' organisations are taking steps, through legislation, collective agreements or otherwise, to meet such problems. But there is need for greater and more effective action to ensure that technological progress takes place with a resultant strengthening of human values and without reducing economic efficiency. Such action should include more effective policies and programmes for achieving and maintaining economic expansion and full employment (VII/55).

129. If the benefits implied in automation are to be extended to all sectors of the community—owners and management and workers of undertakings as well as the consumers generally—and its unfavourable effects minimised, consideration needs to be given in advance—as appropriate in each particular case—to the matters set out below (VI/49).

Co-operation and Consultation

130. Increased productivity can be achieved only if all employers and workers are convinced of its necessity and are prepared to take their part, in a spirit of mutual understanding, in the accomplishment of this task which is in the general interest. The increasing of productivity calls for effective measures in human and industrial relations and in the technical sphere (IV/36).

131. It has been increasingly recognised that a willingness on the part of both management and the workers' representatives to discuss in advance the installation of new production methods, and the possible impact of these changes in a particular undertaking or a particular industrial sector, is necessary to ensure a smooth transition to the new techniques with the minimum of dislocation or stress to the individuals concerned. For this purpose management will find it beneficial to inform workers, through representatives of the trade unions or through other appropriate channels where no trade union exists, at an early stage, of the plans they may have for a changeover to more advanced methods of production and to discuss the consequences of these planned changes so that no changes may be put through without taking account of their social consequences. Where automatic equipment is contemplated for a plant, various methods may be employed by preserving full employment levels. These objectives are best worked out through the process of collective bargaining where it exists (VI/49).

132. Furthermore, since by its nature automation of a process implies higher speed of production and the need for reducing interruptions in operations to a minimum, a determination by both parties to consult freely and frequently during the early stages of planning of any changes and throughout the process of changeover, as well as in regard to continuing operating problems of all kinds, will prove a major factor in ensuring efficient operation (VI/49).

133. The period of time between the initial planning for a new technological change and its subsequent implementation should be used to develop and bring into operation measures which will facilitate the adjustments required without imposing hardships on individual workers. To ensure that the measures developed are as effective as possible, the co-operation and the assistance of workers or their organisations should be sought at this time (VII/55).

134. However they may be defined, automation and related technological developments are bringing about changes, in all sectors of the metal trades and in varying degrees in all countries, at a steadily increasing rate, which may in time have a profound impact on manufacturing processes, management methods, the organisation of industry and the relations of workers to their work. If these changes are to occur with the least hardship to the individuals affected and if their acknowledged benefits are to be made available equitably to all sectors of the community, the parties most directly concerned—employers' and workers' organisations in the metal trades—and, in appropriate fields, the governments, should anticipate the problems raised by these developments and prepare to deal with them on a sound and comprehensive basis and in a co-operative spirit (VI/49).

135. Technological change may reduce or even eliminate the income of some workers directly affected, through transfer to lower-paying jobs, through underemployment, or through unemployment. It is essential that practical steps be developed and put into effect on a co-operative basis between governments, employers and workers or their organisations, which will eliminate such income losses to the maximum extent possible. Such steps might include—

(a) adequate remuneration during periods of training and retraining so that workers can qualify for jobs which provide the same or higher income;

(b) transitional aid in the case of income losses (for example, retention in employment by unemployment insurance and other supplementary unemployment benefits);

(c) special retirement and other provisions for older workers;

(d) effective national employment exchanges;

(e) appropriate aid to permit workers to move to jobs in other enterprises, industries and localities.

Such practical steps should be implemented through legislation, collective bargaining or other means, on a co-operative basis between governments, employers and workers or their organisations and in the light of the situation and general policy prevailing in each country (VII/55).

136. Management can usefully take action to reduce the impact of the changeover to new production methods on the individual workers by such steps as—

(a) training of supervisory personnel for their new operating responsibilities, with special attention to the development of leadership skills;

(b) adopting policies and practices related to improving communication at all levels and between all levels and increasing the sense of mutual confidence and of teamwork within the plant (VI/49).

137. In connection with measures taken to promote productivity, full consideration should be given to full co-operation between all departments in each plant (IV/36).

138. In view of the desirability of ensuring that changes adopted with a view to promoting an increase in productivity shall meet with the co-operation and understanding of workers or their representatives—

(1) employers should explain to the workers concerned the purposes, nature and probable effects of changes designed to increase productivity; and

(2) workers should be free to express their views on changes which concern them and to make suggestions (IV/36).

139. Many of the questions which will need active re-examination in connection with the installation of automation techniques in individual plants are frequently dealt with through collective bargaining or other customary practices and can therefore continue to be considered through these channels (VI/49).

140. Co-operation should take place between the public authorities concerned with education, vocational training and guidance, and organisations of employers and workers in order to work out and apply the most effective and practical programmes and to ensure that technological progress occurs without endangering the effective utilisation of manpower or sacrificing human values (VII/55).

141. Studies and investigations based on sound research techniques should be undertaken in the different branches of the metal trades to determine as clearly and fully as possible the present and future training needs. The projections of training needs and other results of such studies and investigations should be disseminated to all parties concerned. Those responsible for developing training courses, both public and private, should pay particular attention to the findings of such studies and apply them to the new systems of vocational education (VII/55).

142. Technological change is affecting occupations in the metal trades and the qualifications required for them in a great many ways. Some jobs are disappearing, the qualifications needed for many others are being altered, and new jobs are being created. While it is difficult to generalise about trends in respect to unskilled, semi-skilled and some skilled occupations where the picture varies from country to country and even from one undertaking to another, it is clear that needs for highly qualified engineers and scientists, or technicians, and for certain highly skilled trades, are increasing rapidly. In many countries serious shortages of such workers exist in the metal trades and are likely to persist or even become more acute. One of the fundamental reasons why supplies of properly qualified workers have often not been sufficient to meet emerging needs is that educational and training systems have not kept pace with the shifts in job opportunities being caused by technological progress. A general basic education of as solid and wide a nature as possible should be made available to young people prior to their taking up a particular occupation in order to enable them to adapt to the changing requirements of modern industry and take advantage of future job opportunities (VII/55).

143. The programme of vocational training for each occupation or group of related occupations should be drawn up on the basis of a systematic analysis of the tasks, knowledge and vocational abilities involved, particular account being taken of foreseeable evolution and transformation. The programme of vocational training should be reviewed periodically so that it may be kept up to date in the light of technological changes which have already made their appearance or are emerging. It should provide trainees with a solid foundation of theoretical and practical knowledge in keeping with the real needs of the industry. Over and above teaching him about the precise work which he will undertake, the training should as far as possible give the trainee a general knowledge of other occupations of the branch of the metal trades concerned in order to facilitate his future occupational adjustment and promotion (VII/55).

144. The development of automation calls for increased efforts in the field of vocational training at all levels; the new production processes that will be introduced will cause an increased demand for more highly skilled workers, especially in the metal trades. Workers should be encouraged to acquire the necessary higher degrees of skill (VI/49).

145. Training programmes and facilities should be provided for adult workers, on the one hand to readapt their skills, and, on the other, to enable them to familiarise themselves with the continuous and sometimes rapid changes in techniques taking place and to improve their qualifications further in other ways as appropriate (VII/55).

146. New and more flexible systems of basic and vocational training and retraining are necessary for those whose skills and experience have become obsolete or useless to them as individuals seeking a livelihood, and for the purpose of affording justifiable opportunities to those who were insufficiently trained in their youth. Existing systems of education and training and entry into industry should be examined with a view to changes where necessary so as to ensure that every individual, irrespective of age or background, has the opportunity of rising to the highest social, cultural and economic level within his capacity. This is especially justified when individuals are unable to avail themselves of work opportunities because of limitations in their qualifications due to fortuitous circumstances for which they are not personally responsible (VII/55).

147. In order to make it possible to acquire these higher skills and to remedy the shortage of technically qualified workers which already exists in the metal trades in many countries, vocational training and retraining facilities available to all without discrimination should be developed in industrial areas where automation is likely to be extended. These facilities should be set up by governments, local authorities, industrial undertakings or private institutions, individually or collectively, in accordance with national practice. Whatever may be the form of these vocational training and retraining facilities, which will vary from country to country in accordance with the different situations, the essential point is that the principles of these training and retraining programmes should be worked out by agreement among government and employers' and workers' organisations, as appropriate (VI/49).

148. It is extremely important that a sufficient number of adequately qualified vocational and technical teachers be available. Information about teacher training techniques and arrangements needs to be made available to a greater extent, both nationally and internationally (VII/55).

Measures to Be Taken when Introducing Substantial Changes in the Industrial Process

149. Management can usefully take action to reduce the impact of the changeover to new production methods on the individual workers by such steps as—

(a) arranging the changeover during periods of high activity or expanding markets for the firm's products;

(b) timing voluntary departures and recruitment within a plant so as to reduce the problem of lay-offs when the new production systems go into operation (VI/49).

150. Measures which might be used to avoid or minimise the negative effects of adjustments are—

(a) the timing of changes so that advantage can be taken of any expected expansion in the work force or of its attribution resulting from departures and a slowing down of recruitment;

(b) the transfer of workers to other jobs in the undertaking or in another undertaking of the same company for which their qualifications are sufficient;

(c) the retraining and readaptation of workers so that they can be qualified for any new jobs which become available in the undertaking or company;

(d) the review and possible modification of legislative, collective bargaining and other provisions to ensure that workers can be moved to jobs in the undertaking or company to the greatest extent possible and without any loss of their acquired rights (VII/55).

151. Special attention should be devoted to . . . notification, wherever possible, of displacements expected to result from changes in processes or equipment (IV/36).

152. In connection with measures taken to promote productivity, full consideration should be given . . . to the simplification and standardisation of work methods with a view to bringing into employment all possible operative labour (IV/36).

153. It is essential that employers anticipate new technological changes which are likely to be adopted as early as possible so that their effects on the workers in the undertaking can be accurately assessed. Such assessments should indicate the probable effects on the number and types of workers likely to be affected and the kinds of adjustments required (VII/55).

154. Special attention should be devoted to advance planning by employers of changes in industrial processes or equipment (IV/36).

155. The management of an undertaking which changes its production methods by making them more automatic should assume responsibility for retraining the workers it employs so that they may be able, after a certain time, to carry out their new duties. Small and medium-sized undertakings which do not individually possess sufficient means to carry out such a retraining programme should be encouraged to develop such programmes in co-operation with one another or, where appropriate, with the competent authorities. Such training of an undertaking's employees for their new or changed job in the undertaking should be given without cost to the employee and at no loss of pay to him (VI/49).

156. In carrying out retraining programmes, advantage should be taken, wherever possible, of available public and private training facilities (VII/55).

157. Technological changes frequently require adjustments in the number, distribution and qualifications of workers in a particular undertaking. When this occurs, the first objective should be to make these adjustments without resorting to lay-offs or other disadvantages to the workers. Every effort should be made by employers and workers or their organisations to find and put into effect measures which will enable workers whose jobs are changing or disappearing to continue in employment (VII/55).

158. It has been noted that supplemental unemployment benefit plans, severance pay and training allowances have been utilised in several areas, and where such devices might prove beneficial to all concerned, they could be explored (VI/49).

Measures Designed to Assist Worker Mobility

159. Installation of the new processes in existing or newly established plants may create problems requiring relocation of workers. The narrowing job opportunities in a community in which an old plant is automated may make it necessary for workers to leave their homes to obtain new employment. Arrangements should be worked out to compensate a worker for the expense involved in moving himself and his family to the area in which new employment opportunities exist; reasonable assistance to the worker and his family's living will need to be made through regular weekly payments during the period of transition (VI/49).

160. It is also of the utmost importance that assistance of various kinds be available which will encourage occupational and geographical mobility. Obstacles hindering such mobility should be removed as far as possible and positive steps developed to facilitate it without undue burdens being placed on the workers concerned. Such positive steps might include readaptation allowances (for example, training and termination of employment allowances), assistance in respect of moving and resettlement costs and any other appropriate compensation (VII/55).

161. In many cases, technological changes will require the movement of workers to jobs with other employers in the metal trades or in other industries. It is of basic importance, therefore, that the rate of economic growth be sufficient to provide the required number of employment opportunities in the economy as a whole (VII/55).

162. With the development of automation technology, labour and management should examine all conditions and practices which tend to act as deterrents to mobility of the workforce (VI/49).

Assistance to Older Workers

163. Assistance should be provided to older workers in cases where they prove unable to fit into the new work situations resulting from installation of automated processes. Such assistance may mean adjustments in conditions attaching to the granting of old-age or provident fund or retirement benefits, so that displaced older workers can draw such benefit earlier (VI/49).

Wages and Hours

164. The situation existing in the metal trades in regard to shift work practices should be carefully considered and investigations should be carried out regarding the difficulties and personal inconvenience to workers resulting from the establishment of shift work, as well as the means to reduce these where the operating requirements of the new technology make such shift work unavoidable (VI/49).

165. In the metal trades, systems of wage payment based on output have traditionally played an important role. With the technological changes occurring in production methods, manual work is being replaced by machines, whose rhythms reduce or eliminate the influence of the worker on the rate of production. As a result, traditional systems of payment may not be suitable to the new circumstances, and should in that case be reconsidered with a view to possible modification or replacement (VII/55).

Job Environment

166. Changes in production techniques and work organisation bring about modifications in conditions in the metal trades which in turn affect work performance. These modifications sometimes take the form of improvements, but sometimes also create new or more intensive difficulties. There are certain advantages immediately resulting from the application of new techniques: mechanisation of heavy labour tends to reduce physical effort; new installations can be accompanied by better facilities at workplaces offering the workers more comfort and a more healthy and agreeable environment. Less frequent direct contact with the goods being processed reduces the risk of accidents. Technological progress has also made it possible for the undertaking to improve considerably the work environment, notably through better lighting and ventilation methods, by the use of devices or arrangements which reduce or suppress noise and dust, and by the design of machines and tools that take into account human characteristics of a physiological and psychological nature. In modernising old factories and setting up new plants, undertakings should make use of the most modern and effective methods so as to create a working environment which is as safe, healthy and comfortable as possible. Particular attention should be paid to certain aspects of technological progress which may have negative effects on working conditions. Certain occupations, both in the factory and the office, tend to become routine and repetitive operations. Workers responsible for such duties often obtain little or no satisfaction from them. It also appears that the continual attention required by certain highly mechanised operations is likely to expose the workers concerned to increased nervous tension. In order to improve working conditions further and to mitigate any of the above undesirable effects of technological change, use should be made of the results of scientific research in industrial physiology and psychology. In so doing, special efforts should be made to avoid techniques and approaches which are based on too narrow and specialised a view and which may destroy the confidence of the workers. Before introducing new equipment and developing new methods of work, co-operation and consultation should take place between the research personnel, engineers and workers concerned (VII/55).

167. Management can usefully take action to reduce the impact of the changeover to new production methods on the individual workers by such steps as... giving attention to the psychological aspects of adapting the workers to new environmental conditions including—

(i) introducing the worker to his new assignment;

(ii) helping him fit into his new work group (VI/49).

Studies and Investigations

168. One of the most useful steps which can be taken at present is for all parties concerned—government, management and labour—to encourage the continuance of the various types of objectives and factual studies which have already been undertaken in several countries by a number of responsible bodies into the impact of current technological developments. Furthermore, it is desirable that these studies should be supplemented by special investigations into the effect of these developments in the several branches of the metal trades, both at the plant level and at the industry level, in as many countries as possible. Such studies will provide the best basis for intelligent planning with sound knowledge of the problems which are being encountered and of the social and economic measures which may be found necessary for their relief. Governments and public authorities should also undertake and encourage detailed studies of the future needs of the metal trades with respect to skilled personnel, specialists, engineers and technicians. These studies should be carried out in co-operation with the organisations and institutions concerned, and should include the question of adapting technical education courses to current needs. Since automation requires continuing study, both prior to and during its installation, not only as to its development but also as to its effects, governments should assume the responsibility for broad understanding on the part of workers, industry and the public. To this end, governments could initiate periodic discussions to review the latest developments in automation as well as the measures developed to ensure the fair distribution of its benefits among all interested sections of the community (VI/49).

169. At present, with the lack of available knowledge and sometimes limited dissemination, it is hardly possible to get a complete picture of the coverage, rate of implementation and scope of technological change in the different sectors of the metal trades. Similarly, satisfactory data do not exist which would enable a sound estimate to be made of the emerging occupational structure in individual plants and in the various sectors of the metal trades, of the qualifications required for new jobs, and of the extent of displacement resulting from technological innovations. As far as future trends are concerned, the lack of information is even more marked. Nevertheless, it is essential to have such data to assist in drawing up programmes of social action on a sound basis. It is essential to assemble at the national level, with appropriate consultation at regional and local levels where necessary, both information of a general nature and data relating to particular situations, thus enabling the changes and trends in the different sectors of the metal trades to be analysed. This information would need to be made known over as wide an area as possible for the benefit of all interested organisations and institutions. This task would be greatly facilitated by close co-operation between the government services and the organisations of employers and workers concerned. Studies should be undertaken to enable future trends to be forecast and to assess foreseeable needs of an intermediate and long-term nature, in the economic, social, technological and employment fields at the national and industrial levels. The data collected should be used by those concerned to draw up appropriate programmes of social and economic action to avoid the individual hardship and dislocation referred to [previously] and to ensure the equitable distribution of the benefits of technology. Methods and techniques used for establishing this kind of evaluation and forecasting would need to be improved. At the international level, the International Labour Office could play a useful part by acting as an exchange centre for information on methods of research, results of research and outlines of new and effective types of action (VII/55).

VII. International Co-operation

General

170. In the developing countries the metal trades are in the process of being initially established rather than of being transformed technically and in other ways, as is the case generally in the industrialised countries (VII/55). The establishment and growth of the metal trades is of special importance for the economic and social development of less developed countries and can make a substantial contribution to the raising of standards of living and the provision of employment opportunities (VII/59).

171. In developing countries the need to raise the standard of living and the importance of moving towards a more industrialised society with greater economic growth will be of paramount concern. In many cases, if such requirements are to be met satisfactorily, it is essential that assistance from other countries be obtained (VII/55).

172. In view of the situation existing in countries which are insufficiently developed economically, and of the important part which the new techniques of automation can play in those countries when properly used within the framework of national programmes of economic development, governments of highly industrialised countries should favour the continuation and expansion of technical assistance programmes designed to raise the standards of living and to improve the economy of underdeveloped countries (VI/49).

173. Experience has demonstrated the urgent necessity for expansion and further application of technical assistance in all its forms (VI/52).

174. An intensified and concerted programme of action, in both developed and developing countries, should be undertaken by the United Nations and the specialised agencies concerned with a view to accelerating the growth of the metal trades in developing countries (VII/59).

175. Concerted international action to promote the rapid development of economically underdeveloped countries under conditions which ensure reasonable standards of living for the workers concerned is not only desirable for its own sake but can also make an important contribution to the widening of markets and the achievement and maintenance of high and stable levels of employment in the metal trades throughout the world. Such programmes should be planned and executed in close co-operation with the United Nations and the specialised agencies, and special attention should be given to the desirability of concentrating efforts on over-all integrated projects. Technical assistance activities of the International Labour Organisation, whether undertaken under the Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance of the United Nations and Specialised Agencies or under the regular budget of the International Labour Organisation, should be reviewed periodically by the International Labour Conference. The Committee draws attention to the resolution concerning technical assistance and the resolution concerning the international flow of capital for the economic development of underdeveloped countries adopted by the International Labour Conference at its 37th Session in 1954 (V/45).

176. The Governing Body of the International Labour Office is invited to continue and intensify, in the field of the metal trades and to the maximum degree possible, the efforts of the Organisation on programmes of technical assistance to industrially underdeveloped countries (VI/52).

177. The Governing Body of the International Labour Office is invited to instruct the Office, when examining requests for technical assistance which raise problems of concern to the metal trades, to approach, if desirable, the governments of the countries represented on the Metal Trades Committee which are particularly able to provide the technical assistance required and to invite them, in consultation with the employers' and workers' organisations which nominate the delegates to the meetings of the Metal Trades Committee, to examine ways and means of providing the best possible expert assistance in regard to the questions involved. The Governing Body is invited to take steps to ensure that such technical assistance will consist of such services as contribute to the increase of production and, through increased production, contribute to increased employment in the metal trades (III/31).

Use of Democratic Principles and Participation of Employers' and Workers' Groups

178. The Governing Body of the International Labour Office is invited to request the Director-General to—

(1) emphasise to all member States the vital importance of all programmes and plans being established upon solid democratic principles relative to both elaboration and implementation in the metal trades;

(2) encourage the public authorities in the developing countries to follow the example of the I.L.O. in the use of tripartite organs and bodies, so that employers' and workers' organisations can participate at all levels—

(a) whenever guidance or technical assistance is being extended to those countries involving the elaboration and implementation of programming techniques in the metal trades;

(b) in the carrying out by the I.L.O. of projects of technical assistance within the framework of economic, social and vocational training programmes in the metal trades; and

(3) instruct experts appointed by the I.L.O. for technical assistance projects to promote the above principles to the greatest extent possible (VII/58).

179. The Governing Body of the International Labour Office is invited to continue to ensure that the tripartite structure of the I.L.O. is fully utilised to make available the experience of the employers' and workers' organisations in the metal trades in the field of training, and to take the following steps to that end:

(a) to encourage the public authorities in developing countries to consult fully with employers' and workers' organisations whenever a technical assistance programme of vocational training is being planned and executed;

(b) to suggest to the public authorities in the countries receiving technical assistance through I.L.O. channels that they set up tripartite bodies to ensure co-operation and participation in an effective way and on a continuing basis;

(c) to ensure that experts appointed by the I.L.O. are made fully aware of the considerations in (a) and (b) above (VII/57).

Training in Industrialising Countries

180. The establishment of a new industry such as the metal trades in developing countries where the kind of workers needed to operate, maintain and manage modern machines and equipment are very scarce or non-existent creates a number of special training and other problems. These include—

(a) the need to raise an adequate proportion of the population to the levels of literacy which render vocational training more effective and which are a necessary foundation for the more advanced training needed in the highly skilled occupations;

(b) the adaptation of training facilities and methods to suit populations which are mainly agricultural and have little or no industrial tradition;

(c) the almost complete lack of teachers for the various kinds of vocational training courses needed to produce workers for newly established metal trades;

(d) the provision of the best and most efficient equipment in training institutions.

In order to help developing countries in their efforts to overcome these problems, assistance is urgently needed from industrialised countries and international organisations, such as the International Labour Organisation. Such assistance should include the provision of fully qualified training experts who can be made available for periods long enough for an effective and satisfactory job to be done. The I.L.O. is particularly competent to play a leading role in the provision of such experts; the I.L.O. could maintain a list of metal trade experts drawn from employer, worker and government spheres. Another important form of assistance, which should be extended, is the provision of opportunities for training in metal trade occupations in industrialised countries. The I.L.O. could maintain a list of training establishments, public and private, which have facilities available for training. Industrialised countries should also help developing nations in the creation of a body of competent teaching staff. All such efforts should aim at providing workers who will meet the specific needs of the new undertakings being established (VII/55).

181. Measures for international co-operation in regard to vocational training should be co-ordinated through the International Labour Organisation, which has acquired considerable experience in this field (III/29).

182. A programme should be worked out for training in the advanced countries of—

(a) a nucleus of officials from underdeveloped countries who could undertake the organisation of vocational training in their own countries;

(b) a certain number of instructors capable, on their return, of organising or developing the vocational training of instructors.

The movement of trainees between countries should be facilitated by the grant of international fellowships (III/29).

183. In addition to activities which are at present being developed, there is a need for increased attention to be given to vocational training, made necessary by the rapidly accelerating technological changes, and to the provision of fellowships for study and experience in industrially developed countries (VI/52).

Machinery and Equipment Shipped to Developing Countries

184. In developing countries, where new machines and equipment usually have to be imported from other nations, steps should be taken by all concerned to ensure that such machines are not of an inferior standard, that they are provided with adequate safety devices and arrangements, and that their design and functioning are suitable to the conditions of the country in which they are going to be used (VII/55).

Studies of Methods Adopted in Developing Countries

185. Intensive studies should be undertaken of the methods adopted in developing countries in the setting up of new plants and industries in the metal trades so that other developing countries with similar social and economic conditions might benefit from the experience gained by the former (VII/55).

RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED

Discussion and Adoption of the Draft Resolutions

At its seventh plenary sitting the Committee had before it seven draft resolutions. These were presented by the Chairman, in his capacity as Chairman of the Steering Committee. The proceedings of the Metal Trades Committee with regard to each of these seven draft resolutions are indicated below.

1. Draft Resolution concerning Visits by Delegations in the Metal Trades

The Chairman explained that the original draft of this text had been submitted to the Steering Committee by the Workers' group. The Steering Committee had decided that the draft was receivable, and the majority considered it expedient to recommend that the Committee adopt the draft unchanged. However, the Employers' members and the United States Government member had indicated in the Steering Committee their intention to abstain when a vote was taken.

Mr. Arnow (Government delegate, United States) considered that the whole range of tasks entrusted to the Organisation was already a heavy burden and that if it were increased the I.L.O. would be interfering in matters which were not particularly within the scope of its responsibilities. No special reason had been given for asking the Organisation to concern itself with visits by delegations. If this resolution were adopted, there would be a risk that other Industrial Committees would do the same, and that the Organisation would incur heavy expenses. For this reason he would abstain.

Mr. Fowler (Employers' delegate, Australia; Chairman of the Employers' group) stated that the majority in his group would abstain.

Mr. Boyd (Government delegate, United Kingdom) announced that he too would abstain for the same reasons as those given by Mr. Arnow; since visits by delegations were already the subject of bilateral arrangements, there was no reason to burden the Office with this extra task.

Mr. Mazzacano (Workers' delegate, United States), speaking on his own behalf and that of Mr. Menger (Workers' delegate, United States), stated that he and his colleague would abstain.

When put to the vote, the draft resolution concerning visits by delegations in the metal trades received 53 votes in favour, none against, with 64 abstentions. There being no quorum, the draft failed of adoption.

2. Draft Resolution concerning a Reduction in Hours of Work without Reduction of Income in the Metal Trades

The CHAIRMAN explained that the original draft of this text had been presented to the Steering Committee by the Workers' group. The Steering Committee had considered this draft to be receivable, and the majority of the Steering Committee recommended that the Committee adopt it as it stood. However, the Employers' members of the Steering Committee had indicated that they would oppose the adoption of this draft.

Mr. MCGARVEY (Workers' delegate, United Kingdom; Chairman of the Workers' group) explained that, in adopting this draft resolution, the Committee would simply be ratifying a decision previously taken by the International Labour Conference on the subject of the reduction of hours of work without reduction of income. In so doing, the Committee would confirm the progressive spirit of tripartite meetings. In view of the modernisation and automation that was being carried out in the industry, it was necessary for the workers to co-operate fully with the public authorities and the employers in order to solve national economic problems. In the eyes of the workers, a basic prerequisite was precisely the progressive reduction of hours of work without reduction of income.

Mr. TAKEBAYASHI (Government delegate, Japan) reserved his position as regards the whole of the text, for in Japan there were a large number of small-scale enterprises in the metal trades, where hours of work could not be reduced without grave prejudice to the workers' income.

Mr. OLLERVIDES (Employers' delegate, Mexico) stressed the spirit of understanding in which the Mexican public authorities, employers and workers were trying to implement I.L.O. standards. Mexican workers knew that their employers did not deny them greater participation in national economic progress. It was, indeed, desirable that the Government and industrial undertakings should do all in their power to ensure a healthy economic position for the working classes. However, in October 1965, the Mexican employers had discussed this question and had expressed opposition to a reduction in hours of work, for technical reasons which were valid for all developing countries. In fact, any increase in wages that was not accompanied by a corresponding increase in production would result in higher production costs and would lead to a rise in the cost of living. This would strike directly at the economically weakest groups in the population. If developing countries were to advance, there was an absolute need for them to co-ordinate the efforts of employers, workers and government. The most urgent task was to improve the technical level of workers in order to raise national productivity. Only a great technical and cultural effort would enable these countries to benefit fully from their natural resources. Indeed, to compete in international markets, it was essential to have advanced technical equipment.

Mr. BOYD (Government delegate, United Kingdom) recalled that, in the vote which took place at the International Labour Conference the Reduction of Hours of Work Recommendation, 1962 (No. 116), his Government's delegates had abstained. This was because his Government considered that hours of work should be decided by collective bargaining without government intervention. He would therefore abstain.

Mr. ROSAS RODRÍGUEZ (Workers' delegate, Mexico) was anxious to reply to the Employers' delegate from his country, who had just spoken. The Mexican Congress was planning to introduce the 40-hour week with seven days' wages. It was important to increase the workers' purchasing power, rather than to reduce it, in order to create new employment possibilities for those who were unemployed and thus to enable industry to sell its products. He thought that the Mexican Parliament would vote in favour of this reform.

Mr. RAFFO (Employers' delegate, Peru) stressed that if this draft resolution were adopted neither costly investments nor the well-trained labour force—which was far from numerous in countries in course of industrialisation—would be fully utilised. The resulting rise in the cost of living would harm the greater part of the population. In his country there was a law giving a bonus, corresponding to eight hours' work, to workers who had completed 48 hours per week, which meant that seven days' pay was given for six days of actual work. Recently eight holidays had been abolished, with a view to increasing production and the workers' annual income without increasing production costs. In brief, it was a question of making the fullest possible use of workers with a high level of technical skill, and of providing employment for unskilled workers. Any other policy would make the economic development of the country more difficult.

Mr. MAIRE (Workers' delegate, France) was convinced that all the participants were aware of the need to reduce hours of work, but, of course, in a well-considered manner. The Workers' representatives simply asked the I.L.O. to appeal to member States to follow the path marked out by the International Labour Conference at its 46th Session in 1962. As far back as 1957 the Metal Trades Committee had already discussed such a reduction in hours of work, and the decision of the 1962 session of the Conference had been much stronger. Three years had now elapsed, and it was appropriate to take up the Conference's decision again, and to address to member States what was, after all, merely an appeal.

Mr. LETTS (Government delegate, Peru) explained that the payment of a seventh day's work each week was designed, first and foremost, as a remedy for the very high rate of absenteeism on Monday mornings; in this way, workers who had completed a full week were rewarded. Furthermore, it must be remembered that in Peru, a country with Catholic traditions, the number of holidays was very high, and it had had to be reduced. For the rest, Peruvian law was in absolute conformity with international labour Conventions, which formed part of the country's statutory law. It laid down the maximum hours of work authorised, but employers and trade unions were perfectly free to agree upon reduced hours of work, and this had happened in many industrial sectors.

Mr. McGarvey was astonished at the opposition to the draft resolution, in view of the fact that it did not say that governments must reduce hours of work immediately. It simply asked that the provisions of Recommendation No. 116, which had already been alluded to, should be applied as soon as possible in the metal trades. Would the employers from Peru or Japan not accept this principle even when their respective economies had reached stability? Anyway, the workers of these two countries insisted on it. As for the United Kingdom Government delegate, perhaps he was forgetting that the Government delegates who had abstained at the 1962 session of the Conference represented a Conservative Government. The present Labour Government had drawn up a national plan which Mr. Boyd had mentioned in the sixth plenary sitting. Now, this plan foresaw the possibility of a reduction in hours of work. Opposition to the draft resolution was therefore based on a misunderstanding, and it was to be hoped that all the delegates would support this proposal in the hope of improving conditions of work throughout the world.

Mr. BLANCO MELO (Government delegate, Mexico) confirmed that his Government was planning to introduce a law to reduce hours of work to 40 per week. Even though Mexico had reached a relatively high level, it was none the less a developing country. It was therefore striving for a better social balance, and wanted to offer better conditions to those who were not yet employed. For employees in the public sector even a 37-hour week was being considered and, of course, the working day must never exceed eight hours. He was therefore able to confirm that his Government had taken the initiative in this matter.

Mr. SOLÓRZANO (Workers' delegate, Peru) confirmed that his country respected all the obligations deriving from international Conventions. In Peru, thanks to active trade unions and to the efforts for mutual understanding between the parties concerned, certain groups of workers already benefited from the 40-hour week. This was the case for 40 per cent. of the country's industrial labour. Moreover, the Parliament had approved a law whereby hours of work in the civil service would be reduced.

The resolution (No. 65) concerning a reduction in hours of work without reduction of income in the metal trades was adopted by 81 votes in favour, 39 against, with 19 abstentions. The text is reproduced below.

3. Draft Resolution concerning Women Workers in the Metal Trades

The CHAIRMAN explained that the original draft of this text had been submitted to the Steering Committee by the Workers' group. The Steering Committee had decided that the draft was receivable, and had then forwarded it to its drafting committee, which had made certain amendments in both the preamble and the operative part. The Steering Committee unanimously recommended that the plenary Committee adopt the draft as amended.

Mr. FOWLER (Employers' delegate, Australia; Chairman of the Employers' group) stated that his group would vote in favour of the text.

The resolution (No. 66) concerning women workers in the metal trades was adopted unanimously. The text is reproduced below.

4. Draft Resolution concerning Labour Statistics in the Metal Trades

The CHAIRMAN explained that the original draft of this text had been submitted to the Steering Committee by the Workers' group. The Steering Committee had declared the draft to be receivable and had forwarded it to its drafting committee. The latter had altered the order of the paragraphs in the operative part, and the Steering Committee recommended that the plenary Committee adopt the draft as amended.

Mr. FOWLER (Employers' delegate, Australia; Chairman of the Employers' group) stated that the Employers' delegates would vote in favour of the text, but that some of them had reservations to make.

Mr. DE SAEDELEER (Employers' delegate, Belgium) explained that the employers, as users of statistics, were anxious, above all, to have access to comparable statistics. As it was, both governments and international or regional organisations published statistics which were not really comparable. The Employers' delegates therefore wished the Director-General to draw the special attention of the bodies with whom he would get in touch to the need to produce easily comparable statistics.

Mr. MUKHERJEE (Employers' delegate, India) would have preferred the fourth paragraph of the preamble to the draft resolution to say not that no exact figures were available as to the number of workers employed in the metal trades in developing countries, for such data did exist, but rather that the statistics available on employment and income in these countries were inadequate.

The resolution (No. 67) concerning labour statistics in the metal trades was adopted unanimously. The text is reproduced below.

5. Draft Resolution concerning Freedom of Association and Trade Union Rights in the Metal Trades

The CHAIRMAN explained that the original draft of this text had been submitted to the Steering Committee by the Workers' group. The Steering Committee had declared it to be receivable and had forwarded it to its drafting committee. The latter had made a small amendment in clause (a) of the operative paragraph, and the Steering Committee considered it expedient that the draft resolution as amended be adopted.

Mr. FOWLER (Employers' delegate, Australia; Chairman of the Employers' group) stated that the majority of the members of his group would vote in favour of the draft.

The resolution (No. 68) concerning freedom of association and trade union rights in the metal trades was adopted unanimously. The text is reproduced below.

6. Draft Resolution concerning Future Action of the International Labour Organisation relating to the Metal Trades

The CHAIRMAN explained that the basic elements of this draft were originally contained in two texts submitted to the Steering Committee by the Workers' group. The Steering Committee had forwarded them to its drafting committee, which had incorporated the parts relating to future I.L.O. action into a single text. The Steering Committee unanimously recommended the adoption of clauses (b), (c) and (d) of the operative paragraph, while the majority in the Steering Committee had also been in favour of clause (a). The Employers' members of the Steering Committee, however, had opposed the adoption of this clause, while the United Kingdom and the United States Government members had expressed reservations. The Employers' and Workers' members of the Steering Committee were now submitting an amendment to clause (a).

Mr. PURUSHOTTAM (Government delegate, India) supported the draft resolution but stated that it was wrong, in the fifth paragraph of the preamble, to speak of " the increasing liberalisation " of world trade.

Mr. LETTS (Government delegate, Peru) drew attention to a discrepancy between the Spanish version of the draft, in which the words used were " liberalismo creciente ", and the English version.

Mr. Purushottam added that he understood from a private comment which Mr. Letts had just made to him that the latter would also be opposed to the statement that there was an increasing liberalisation of world trade.

Mr. MCGARVEY (Workers' delegate, United Kingdom; Chairman of the Workers' group) expressed astonishment at the remarks made by the Government delegates. He took this opportunity to point out the wisdom of the late Mr. Ernest Bevin in initiating the setting up, within the I.L.O., of Industrial Committees which gave employers' and workers' representatives the chance to come to an understanding on basic principles. It was in this way that, in the case of the present draft resolution, the Employers' and Workers' delegates had been able to reach a happy agreement.

The draft amendment to clause (a) of the operative paragraph was adopted unanimously.

The resolution (No. 69) concerning future action of the International Labour Organisation relating to the metal trades, as amended, was adopted unanimously. The text is reproduced below.

7. Draft Resolution concerning the Agenda of the Ninth Session of the Metal Trades Committee of the International Labour Organisation

The CHAIRMAN explained that this draft resolution was derived from two texts, one of which had been submitted by the Workers' group and the other by the Employers' group. Having decided that these two texts were receivable, the Steering Committee had forwarded them to its drafting committee, which had combined them to make a single text. However, no agreement had been reached in the Steering Committee. The Workers' members had opposed point (3) entitled " Absenteeism in the metal trades; its causes, effects, and remedies ". After unsuccessful efforts to reach a compromise, the Steering Committee decided to submit the text concerned to the Committee, both the Employers' members and the Workers' members reserving the right to make further proposals in plenary sitting. The Workers' group had now submitted a draft amendment to the draft resolution; the object of this amendment was to replace the whole of the operative part of the draft resolution submitted by the Steering Committee.

Mr. FOWLER (Employers' delegate, Australia; Chairman of the Employers' group) noted that the draft amendment submitted by the Workers' group was designed to replace the four points in the operative part of the draft resolution by two partially new points. This would, in effect, suppress the above-mentioned point (3) which the Employers' members had proposed. Such tactics prevented normal discussion from taking place. The Employers' delegates had thought that they could rely on each of the four points in the draft resolution being considered by the plenary meeting and, if necessary, being voted on separately. In these circumstances the Employers' delegates had no option but to oppose the draft amendment submitted by the Workers' group, while protesting against these procedural tactics.

Mr. MCGARVEY (Workers' delegate, United Kingdom; Chairman of the Workers' group) rejected the insinuations of the previous speaker. It was true that they had tried to reach a compromise on the four items proposed for the agenda of the Ninth Session of the Committee, but the Employers' members of the Steering Committee had found it impossible to accept the suggestion made by the Workers' members to combine points (1) and (2) of the draft resolution into a single point. As for point (4), there had never been any argument about this. It had therefore been up to the Workers' delegates to formulate proposals, which they had done in their draft amendment, while it was up to the Employers to decide what their attitude would be to this quite normal action on the part of the Workers' delegates. There had been no sharp practice on the part of the latter, and they had always made it clear that they could not accept point (3) concerning absenteeism.

Mr. BOYD (Government delegate, United Kingdom) said that there had been a misunderstanding. In an effort to help, and basing himself on article 10, paragraph 6, of the Standing Orders for Industrial and Analogous Committees, he proposed the following subamendment to the amendment submitted by the Workers' group:

Insert, either between points (1) and (2) of the draft amendment of the Workers' group (point (2) thus becoming point (3)), or as a new point (3), the following text: " The effects on levels of remuneration and productivity, and on industrial relations, of excessive labour turnover and of irregular attendance."

He added that this problem was a matter of concern to all sides of the metal trades. In a situation of full employment there did indeed seem to be an excessive turnover of labour and, for various reasons, irregular attendance at work. Productivity went down, especially in automated undertakings. Industrial relations were harmed, as were the levels of remuneration of the great majority of the workers. The speaker therefore confidently hoped for the support of a number of Government delegates and asked the Workers' and Employers' groups to give serious consideration to this proposal and thus to preserve the unanimity which was essential for the effective working of the I.L.O.

As for the French text of the subamendment submitted by Mr. Boyd, after statements by Mr. HOULLEZ (Government delegate, Belgium), who expressed doubts about the correctness of the term " rotation ", by Mr. BOURSIER (Employers' delegate, France), who confirmed the indications given by the Assistant Secretary-General on the use of this term, the Chairman decided that the text of the subamendment would include the expression " rotation des travailleurs " as a translation of the English expression " turnover ".

As to the receivability of the subamendment, the Chairman stated, in reply to doubts expressed by Mr. Houllez, that the text in question had been given to him in writing, so that he considered that the Standing Orders had been followed.

Mr. Fowler expressed the view that the Government delegate of the United Kingdom had found a very happy solution, a text which did not arouse emotional reactions such as those provoked by the formula proposed by the Employers' members for point (3). He was therefore able to withdraw the remarks he had made on the subject of procedure, and he indicated that the Employers' group supported Mr. Boyd's subamendment.

Mr. McGarvey declared that his group could not accept the subamendment. To discuss irregular attendance at work would mean that the I.L.O. was to extend its studies to the right to strike. The terms used for point (3) had been changed, but they still implied an accusation against the workers. In these circumstances the Workers' group would abstain.

Mr. Fowler pointed out that the Employers had made it very clear, when submitting their original proposal, that they did not intend to include strikes in this point. The expression " absenteeism ", at any rate in English, did not cover strikes, and the same applied to Mr. Boyd's formula.

Mr. DÍAZ (Workers' adviser, Argentina) nevertheless considered that the term proposed led to confusion, since, basically, the idea was to punish absenteeism without giving a reason; the Workers' delegates from Argentina would therefore abstain.

Mr. JACCARD (Employers' delegate, France) explained, with a view to clearing up a misunderstanding, that there was no question of punishing of absenteeism, either in the original draft submitted by the Employers or in Mr. Boyd's subamendment. The latter had the advantage of stressing the economic and social consequences of absenteeism or irregular attendance. During the past few days the Workers' delegates had emphasised the importance of regular income for the workers; now, absenteeism was an important factor in the reduction of workers' earnings, and it would be interesting to consider together what remedies might be used against such harmful effects.

When put to the vote, the subamendment submitted by Mr. Boyd received 54 votes in favour, none against, with 76 abstentions. There being no quorum, the subamendment failed of adoption.

Mr. FOGARTY (Government delegate, Australia) stated that he would abstain when the amendment submitted by the Workers' group was put to the vote. He did not think that the various subjects suggested for the agenda of the Ninth Session of the Metal Trades Committee were really peculiar to this industry. In abstaining, he was acting in accordance with the views of his Government on the subject of the scope of the activities of the Industrial Committees, views which had been made known to the Governing Body's Working Party on the Programme and Structure of the I.L.O.

Mr. Fowler pointed out that, in point (1) of its amendment, the Workers' group had itself taken up an earlier suggestion made by the Employers' members of the Steering Committee, but that the result did not satisfy the Employers, who would abstain.

When put to the vote, the draft amendment submitted by the Workers' group was adopted by 79 votes in favour, none against, with 55 abstentions.

Mr. LAPIERRE (Government delegate, France) wished to make it clear that the abstention of his country's Government delegates was for reasons solely connected with wording, and not for any basic reasons. It seemed to them that, while the two texts referred to identical principles, the wording of points (1) and (2) of the draft submitted by the Steering Committee was much more satisfactory than that of point (1) of the amendment; if the vote just taken had been negative, they would have asked for the four points of the operative part of the original draft to be voted upon point by point.

Mr. Fowler requested that the Committee be consulted again by a record vote. Replying to a comment by Mr. McGarvey, the Chairman declared the request to be receivable.

In the record vote the draft amendment submitted by the Workers' group was adopted by 84 votes in favour, none against, with 55 abstentions.

The resolution (No. 70) concerning the agenda of the Ninth Session of the Metal Trades Committee of the International Labour Organisation was then adopted as amended. The text is reproduced below.

TEXTS OF THE RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED

Resolution (No. 65) concerning a Reduction in Hours of Work without Reduction of Income in the Metal Trades [1]

The Metal Trades Committee of the International Labour Organisation,

Having met in its Eighth Session in Geneva from 6 to 17 December 1965,

Considering the importance attached by workers' organisations to a reduction in hours of work, in all its aspects, without loss of earnings,

Considering the effects of technological progress and new methods of production on hours of work in the metal trades and the need to create new employment opportunities for young persons,

Referring to the Reduction of Hours of Work Recommendation (No. 116), adopted by the International Labour Conference in 1962, and in particular to Paragraph 1 of this Recommendation, which requests member States to formulate and pursue a national policy designed to promote by methods appropriate to conditions in each industry a progressive reduction of normal hours of work, and to Paragraph 4, which specifies that this should happen without any reduction in the wages of the workers,

Recalling also the resolution (No. 53) on this subject, adopted by the Metal Trades Committee in 1957;

Adopts this sixteenth day of December 1965 the following resolution:

The Governing Body of the International Labour Office is invited to request the Director-General—

(a) to make an appeal to those States Members of the International Labour Organisation which have not already done so to apply in the metal trades the Reduction of Hours of Work Recommendation, 1962 (No. 116);

(b) to invite the governments of all member States to apply as rapidly as possible, in collaboration with employers' and workers' organisations, the provisions of Recommendation No. 116 in the metal trades, and to communicate to the Director-General of the International Labour Office information on the results obtained, in accordance with Paragraph 10 of the aforementioned Recommendation.

[1] Adopted by 81 votes in favour, 39 against, with 19 abstentions.

Resolution (No. 66) concerning Women Workers in the Metal Trades [1]

The Metal Trades Committee of the International Labour Organisation,

Having met in its Eighth Session in Geneva from 6 to 17 December 1965,

Considering the right of women to participate fully in the economic life of their country,

Considering the important and increasing role of women in many sectors of the metal trades,

Considering the need to provide suitable conditions of work for women, to facilitate their access to vocational training, and to ensure them jobs and opportunities for promotion at all levels,

Considering the effects of modern production techniques and the need which may arise for appropriate protective measures, and

Recalling the standards adopted by the International Labour Conference in the Conventions and Recommendations specially related to women workers,

Recalling in particular the Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951, the Maternity Protection Convention (Revised), 1952, and the Employment (Women with Family Responsibilities) Recommendation, 1965,

Recalling also the fundamental principles of non-discrimination contained in the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation, in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and in the international labour instruments relating to vocational training and to employment;

Adopts this sixteenth day of December 1965 the following resolution:

The Governing Body of the International Labour Office is invited to request the Director-General—

(a) to undertake studies on the above-mentioned problems and on the conditions of work and life of women workers in the metal trades, in the light of the standards which have been adopted by the International Labour Organisation;

(b) to associate the workers' and employers' organisations directly concerned in the carrying out of these studies; and

(c) to include, in the General Report to be presented by the International Labour Office to the next session of the Metal Trades Committee, a chapter concerning the social problems of women workers in these trades.

Resolution (No. 67) concerning Labour Statistics in the Metal Trades [1]

The Metal Trades Committee of the International Labour Organisation,

Having met in its Eighth Session in Geneva from 6 to 17 December 1965,

Considering that statistical and other similar data are of great importance for and contribute to the proper assessment of the social situation in the metal trades in the States Members of the International Labour Organisation,

Considering that no exact figures are available as to the number of workers employed in the metal trades in the developing countries,

Considering further that the reports and other documents of the International Labour Organisation should contain more specific data as to the number of workers (men, women and young persons) in the different sectors of employment in the metal trades, according to countries and according to skills and job classifications,

Considering that wage and related income statistics should be made available to reflect the purchasing power of the workers in the different sectors of employment to facilitate national and regional comparisons,

---

[1] Adopted unanimously.

Considering that because of its universal and tripartite character the International Labour Organisation is particularly suited and well-equipped to collect and publish such information,

Welcoming the general information already available in the International Labour Office's Year Book of Labour Statistics and its supplements;

Adopts this sixteenth day of December 1965 the following resolution:

The Governing Body of the International Labour Office is invited to request the Director-General—

(a) to extend, within the framework of the technical co-operation programmes of the International Labour Organisation and of the United Nations organisations, assistance with a view to setting up and improving statistical services, particularly in the developing countries;

(b) to search for closer co-operation from the governments, as well as workers' and employers' organisations in the States Members of the International Labour Organisation, to achieve this objective;

(c) to collect and publish labour statistics and other similar data concerning specifically workers in the metal trades.

Resolution (No. 68) concerning Freedom of Association and Trade Union Rights in the Metal Trades [1]

The Metal Trades Committee of the International Labour Organisation,

Having met in its Eighth Session in Geneva from 6 to 17 December 1965,

Considering the fundamental principles of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), and of the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98),

Considering the importance of respecting trade union rights in the metal trades,

Expressing its satisfaction at the work already accomplished by the International Labour Organisation for the defence of freedom of association and trade union rights at all levels, and

Recalling in particular paragraphs 1, 2 and 3 of the operative part of the resolution concerning freedom of association and the protection of the right to organise, including the protection of representatives of trade unions at all levels, which was adopted by the International Labour Conference at its 45th Session (1961);

Adopts this sixteenth day of December 1965 the following resolution:

The Governing Body of the International Labour Office is invited to request the Director-General—

(a) to draw the attention of the governments of all member States, and through them that of the employers' and workers' organisations concerned, to the need to apply the provisions of Conventions Nos. 87 and 98 to the persons employed in the metal trades, particularly at the level of the undertakings, and to ensure the protection of workers and their representatives in these undertakings;

(b) to urge the governments and the employers' and workers' organisations concerned to denounce all cases where these Conventions are not effectively respected and implemented as regards the metal trades, making use, where appropriate, of the procedures laid down for the application of international labour Conventions and for the examination of alleged violations of freedom of association.

Resolution (No. 69) concerning Future Action of the International Labour Organisation relating to the Metal Trades [1]

The Metal Trades Committee of the International Labour Organisation,

Having met in its Eighth Session in Geneva from 6 to 17 December 1965,

[1] Adopted unanimously.

Considering that the Declaration of Philadelphia recognises the solemn obligation of the International Labour Organisation to further among the nations of the world programmes which will achieve full employment and the raising of standards of living, and that the preamble to the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation provides amongst other objectives for the prevention of unemployment, the provision of an adequate living wage, the regulation of the hours of work, the protection of the worker against sickness and occupational disease, as well as provision for old age,

Considering that under the terms of the Declaration of Philadelphia it is the responsibility of the International Labour Organisation to examine and consider all international economic and financial policies and measures in the light of the fundamental objective that "all human beings, irrespective of race, creed or sex, have the right to pursue both their material well-being and their spiritual development in conditions of freedom and dignity, of economic security and equal opportunity",

Considering that, in view of the impact of modern technology, the increasing liberalisation and changing patterns of world trade, the role that certain undertakings play in the economic life of developing countries, and the international character of capital investment in several sectors of the metal trades, such as the automotive, electrical engineering, aerospace and aluminium industries, new social problems are arising both in the industrialised and developing countries at the plant, national and international levels,

Considering that it is the task of the International Labour Organisation to further trends and measures which will contribute to the progressive improvement of the working and living conditions of the workers employed in the metal trades,

Considering that increasing similarity in the level of technology and equipment of several sectors of the metal trades makes international comparisons more readily possible and desirable,

Considering the resolution concerning the industrial activities of the International Labour Organisation, adopted by the 49th Session of the International Labour Conference (1965),

Considering that the above-mentioned resolution invites the Governing Body to request, as appropriate, the Director-General and/or the Working Party of the Governing Body on the Programme and Structure of the Organisation to devote particular attention to practical measures which would lead to the strengthening of the International Labour Organisation's activities in the industrial field,

Welcoming the recently adopted practice of submitting to the Committee on Industrial Committees of the Governing Body, in between sessions of an Industrial Committee, periodical reports on the follow-up of conclusions of that Industrial Committee;

Adopts this sixteenth day of December 1965 the following resolution:

The Governing Body is invited to request the Director-General—

(a) to assemble statistical and such other data as will enable a fair comparison to be made, taking into consideration the economic structure in each sector and country concerned, as to the remuneration, working and living conditions of workers employed in those sectors of the metal trades in which international operations are most widely practised;

(b) to study the social problems arising out of the increasingly international character of economic decisions in the metal trades;

(c) to undertake, as a needed contribution to effective manpower planning and vocational training, a study of the changes in job qualifications and contents at various stages of mechanisation and automation in the metal trades; and

(d) to prepare a study of all vocational training and productivity programmes in the field of metal trades to which the International Labour Organisation has extended its support and co-operation since the Seventh Session of the Committee (1962); to establish the extent to which the principle of tripartite participation envisaged in resolutions Nos. 57 and 58 has been put into practice; and to provide information on what steps have been taken by the International Labour Organisation to bring about effective participation where it is absent or ineffective.

Resolution (No. 70) concerning the Agenda of the Ninth Session of the Metal Trades Committee of the International Labour Organisation [1]

The Metal Trades Committee of the International Labour Organisation,

Having met in its Eighth Session in Geneva from 6 to 17 December 1965;

Recommends that, when deciding on the agenda of the Ninth Session of the Committee, the Governing Body select items from amongst the following range of subjects:

(1) the social consequences of structural changes and economic fluctuations in the metal trades, particularly on employment and workers' income, including changes in the structure of the occupational groups in these trades, in relation to the application of skills and to the training of workers in general, and in particular of older and physically handicapped workers;

(2) the betterment of the working and living conditions of workers in the metal trades, taking into account the increasing extent of international operations in these trades.

[1] Points (1) and (2) of the operative part which were submitted by the Workers' group as an amendment to the original draft resolution were adopted as a result of a record vote of 84 votes in favour, none against, with 55 abstentions. The resolution was then adopted as amended.

Interpretation of Decisions of the International Labour Conference

Fee-Charging Employment Agencies Convention (Revised), 1949 (No. 96)

The German Federal Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs requested from the International Labour Office certain information concerning the interpretation of the term " worker ", as used in this Convention.

In addition, the Ministry of Health and Social Affairs of Sweden requested from the International Labour Office certain information concerning the interpretation of Article 1, paragraph 1 (a), of the said Convention.

With the usual reservation that the Constitution does not give him any special authority to interpret Conventions adopted by the International Labour Conference, the Director-General of the International Labour Office transmitted, on 25 November 1964 to the German Federal Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs, and on 9 December 1965 to the Ministry of Health and Social Affairs of Sweden, the following memoranda prepared by the International Labour Office:

Memorandum Sent by the International Labour Office to the German Federal Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs

1. The German Federal Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs has asked the International Labour Office to throw light on the meaning of the term " worker " as used in the Fee-Charging Employment Agencies Convention (Revised), 1949. In particular, the question is raised whether the term covers only manual workers or refers also to salaried employees.

2. While the term " worker " occurs in several Articles of the instrument, its use in Article 1 is of primary importance for the purpose of the inquiry since it there serves to determine the scope of the instrument. Article 1 reads as follows:

> 1. For the purpose of this Convention the expression " fee-charging employment agency " means—
> (a) employment agencies conducted with a view to profit, that is to say, any person, company, institution, agency or other organisation which acts as an intermediary for the purpose of procuring employment for a worker or supplying a worker for an employer with a view to deriving either directly or indirectly any pecuniary or other material advantage from either employer or worker; the expression does not include newspapers or other publications unless they are published wholly or mainly for the purpose of acting as intermediaries between employers and workers;
> (b) employment agencies not conducted with a view to profit, that is to say, the placing services of any company, institution, agency or other organisation which, though not conducted with a view to deriving any pecuniary or other material advantage, levies from either employer or worker for the above services an entrance fee, a periodical contribution or any other charge.
> 2. This Convention does not apply to the placing of seamen.

3. This Article was not changed—or discussed—at the time of the adoption of the revising Convention in 1949 and is accordingly the same as that contained in the Fee-Charging Employment Agencies Convention, 1933 (No. 34).

4. The preparatory work for Convention No. 34 reveals detailed consideration of the scope of the instrument in terms of occupations in which the use of fee-charging employment agencies was to be prohibited. The questionnaire addressed to governments asked whether a list of occupations should be specified, or whether the prohibition contemplated should be laid down in general terms as applicable to all occupations, subject to possible exceptions to be specified for certain occupations. On the basis of the replies of governments it was concluded that " the draft Convention should lay down the prohibition of employment agencies carried on for profit in general terms as applicable for all occupations (excluding seamen) but subject to possible exceptions for certain occupations " (Report I, International Labour Conference, 17th Session, pp. 95-97). It may also be noted that in this connection the report to the Conference emphasised that, subject to the exclusion of seamen, " the item on the agenda comprises within its range all occupations and forms of employment, e.g. industry, agriculture, commerce, domestic service and similar employment, professional occupations, theatrical and similar occupations, etc.".

5. It was on this basis that Article 1 of the instrument was so drafted as to refer to employers and workers in general terms (subject to the exclusion of seafarers in paragraph 2 of the Article) while Article 3 (to which Article 5 of the revising Convention may be compared) made provision for possible exceptions. No question was raised on this aspect of the definition in the discussions at the 17th Session of the Conference.

6. The information received from governments which have ratified one or both of the fee-charging employment agencies Conventions on the manner in which they are applying the provisions in question also suggests that in practice the term " worker " has been regarded as applying to all categories of workers and not only to manual workers.

7. Finally, it may not be irrelevant to note that on 15 November 1932—i.e. at a time when the preparatory work of the Fee-Charging Employment Agencies Convention, 1933, was in progress—the Permanent Court of International Justice gave an Advisory Opinion on the question whether the Night Work (Women) Convention, 1919, applied " to women who hold positions of supervision or management and are not ordinarily engaged in manual work " (see Official Bulletin, Vol. XVII, No. 5, pp. 179-191). It had been argued before the Court that general words, such as " persons " or " women ", used in international labour Conventions must be regarded as referring only to manual workers, since it was only with them that the International Labour Organisation was intended to concern itself. The Court found that this was not so. It pointed out that the words used in the preamble and operative articles of the Constitution of the Organisation (then Part XIII of the Treaty of Versailles) to describe the individuals who are the subjects of the Organisation's activities are not words which are confined to manual workers. " The words used are ' travailleurs ', ' workers ', ' workpeople ', ' travailleurs salariés ', ' wage earners ', words which do not exclude employed persons doing non-manual work, as perhaps might have been held to be the case if the words used had been ' ouvrier ' or ' labourer ' " (op. cit., p. 187). By reference to this view, and after examination of the preparatory work for the specific Convention before it, the Court held that the Convention applied to women holding positions of supervision or management and not ordinarily engaged in manual work.

Memorandum Sent by the International Labour Office to the Ministry of Health and Social Affairs of Sweden

1. The Ministry of Health and Social Affairs of Sweden has requested the International Labour Office to provide clarification as to the scope of the definition of employment agencies conducted with a view to profit contained in Article 1, paragraph 1 (a), of the Fee-Charging Employment Agencies Convention (Revised), 1949 (No. 96).

2. Article 1, paragraph 1 (a), defines employment agencies conducted with a view to profit as—

. . . any person, company, institution, agency or other organisation which acts as an intermediary for the purpose of procuring employment for a worker or supplying a worker for an employer with a view to deriving either directly or indirectly any pecuniary or other material advantage from either employer or worker; the expression does not include newspapers or other publications unless they are published wholly or mainly for the purpose of acting as intermediaries between employers and workers.

3. In its request the Ministry of Health and Social Affairs referred to the Swedish Act of 18 April 1935 to issue certain provisions respecting employment agencies, as amended by an Act of 30 April 1942, and indicated that the Supreme Court of Justice of Sweden had ruled in 1962 that agencies known as " ambulatory typewriting agencies " were employment agencies within the scope of this legislation, which prohibits the carrying out of placing services by private persons for purposes of gain. The Ministry stated that a committee had recently been established by the Swedish Government to review the provisions of the Act of 1935, and that in the course of the committee's work the question might arise of considering a liberalisation, so far as " ambulatory typewriting agencies " were concerned, of the provisions prohibiting the establishment of private employment agencies. Before such a liberalisation was considered, it had to be ascertained to what extent liberalisation would be possible in view of the provisions of the Fee-Charging Employment Agencies Convention (Revised), 1949, which Sweden had ratified. It would be necessary to determine in particular whether the expression " employment agency ", as used for the purposes of the Convention, covered the " ambulatory typewriting agencies " as well as other forms of hiring out of labour, as was considered to be the case in Sweden. The view of the International Labour Office was accordingly sought on this question.

4. The Ministry appended to its request a memorandum which, in addition to outlining the development of the relevant legislative provisions, described in greater detail the nature of the operations of " ambulatory typewriting agencies " as follows:

Typewriting agencies are on the whole operated in either of two ways. One working method is that the agency undertakes certain specified tasks which are then carried out under the guidance and at the responsibility of the agency by employees of the agency itself. This may be the case, for instance, as regards the typing of manuscripts, the making out of lists or tables on the basis of certain given data, or simply the copying of certain texts. The manner and the period in which the work is to be done, the quality of the work, etc., might be agreed upon more or less in detail, but within the limits set by such an agreement the agency is at liberty to carry out the work as it deems best. The main purpose of activities of this kind may be said to be to supply products of labour according to order. The main purpose of the second kind of typewriting agency—the so-called ambulatory typewriting agency—is, however, to supply labour, namely office staff in the agency's own employment. Here the person, at whose disposal staff is placed by the agency, decides what work is to be carried out and himself supervises the job. In some cases the agency may perhaps guarantee that the staff provided holds certain qualifications, but it assumes no other responsibility for the labour product than that which may arise out of the said guarantee. The staff may be placed at somebody's disposal when, for instance, a temporary need for extra labour arises. The staff is employed and paid by the agency, but only receives pay as long as it works for an outside party. From the legal point of view upheld in Sweden, ambulatory typewriting agencies as thus described are probably considered as employment agencies, whereas this is not the case in respect of typewriting agencies operated in other forms. It may of course sometimes be difficult to draw a border line between the different types of operations. The description given above of the two main ways in which the typewriting agencies are operated may in certain cases not provide sufficient guidance as to whether a given kind of activity should be considered as an employment agency or not. It is also fairly common that both of the working methods recently described are applied by one and the same agency, part of the agency's staff being engaged in the one way and another part in the other, or the entire staff rotating between the two types of work.

In its judgments of 31 December 1962 the Supreme Court set forth the circumstances specially considered by the Court in its assessment of the activities under consideration in the cases before it. In one of the cases (a limited company) these circumstances were described as follows.

The company has employed a large number of persons for the carrying out of various kinds of office work. To a considerable extent this work has then been carried out by the company's employees not in the office of the company but on the premises of other enterprises with an organisation of their own for the same kind of work. The reason for this arrangement has often been that the enterprise has suffered from a shortage of staff due to vacations, illness or a temporary increase in the normal workload; the duration of the arrangement has, in its turn, depended on how long the enterprise has been in need of outside staff. Even though the company and the enterprise may have made an agreement as to the nature of the tasks to be carried out by the company's employees, the said employees have in many cases when performing their work within the enterprise come to form such a part of the enterprise's own organisation that the part played by the company cannot reasonably be described as anything but a mere placing of labour at the enterprise's disposal. To a considerable extent the company's employees have carried out all their work elsewhere than in the company offices. They have—albeit at their own request—worked only periodically, and when not working as employees of the company they have received no salary from the company; during such periods they have been quite free to work for another employer.

The Supreme Court ruled that the activities of the company, to the extent that they had been of the kind thus described, should be deemed to be placing services covered by the provisions of the 1935 Act.

5. It appears to be clear from the description which has been given that the agencies concerned operate with a view to profit. On this basis, it is proposed in the present memorandum to deal with the following three questions:

(a) Can an agency be considered to be a fee-charging employment agency within the meaning of the Convention where no direct contractual relationship is established between the worker and the person or undertaking for whom the services are performed and where there is a contractual relationship between the agency and the worker?

(b) If the answer to the preceding question is affirmative, are agencies of the kind referred to in the request under consideration to be regarded as fee-charging employment agencies within the scope of the Convention?

(c) If the answer to the second question is also affirmative, what would be the consequences for the operation of the agencies concerned in a country bound by the Convention?

A. Placing where No Direct Contractual Relationship Is Established between the Worker and the User of His Services, and where There Is Such a Relationship between the Placing Agency and the Worker

6. The definition of employment agencies conducted with a view to profit, contained in Article 1, paragraph 1 (a), of the Convention, refers to an agency which " acts as an intermediary for the purpose of procuring employment for a worker or supplying a worker for an employer ". The questions arise, firstly, whether the use of the terms " employment " and " employer " restricts the scope of the Convention to cases in which a contractual relationship is established between the worker and the user of his services, and, secondly, whether an agency can be regarded as an " intermediary " in the meaning of the Convention if the worker is under contract with the agency itself and not with the person or undertaking for whom he performs services.

7. There would seem to be nothing inherent in the terms " employment " and " employer" to give the Convention so restrictive a meaning. The Oxford English Dictionary defines the words " employ " and " employment " to mean " use the services of a person in a professional capacity or in a transaction of some special business " as well as " have or maintain [a person] in one's service ". Black's Law Dictionary [1] expressly states with reference to " employment " that " it does not necessarily import an engagement ". As far as the I.L.O.'s practice in the use of these two terms is concerned, it may perhaps be useful to refer to the explanation of the terms " occupation " and " employment " given to the Committee on Discrimination at the 42nd Session of the Conference, in connection with the question whether the proposed Convention concerning discrimination in respect of employment and occupation applied to independent workers: " in response to a question on the meaning to be attributed to the terms ' occupation ' and ' employment ' [the representative of the Secretary-General] said that in I.L.O. instruments the first term was generally used as denoting a branch of skill while the second was used in reference to the specific circumstances in which this skill was exercised." [2]

8. The view that Article 1, paragraph 1 (a), of the Convention does not have so restrictive a meaning appears to be further borne out by the relevant preparatory work. As the definition of " fee-charging employment agency " was taken over unchanged from the Fee-

[1] 4th edition, St. Paul, Minnesota, 1951.

[2] See Record of Proceedings, International Labour Conference, 42nd Session, Geneva, 1958, para. 15, p. 711.

Charging Employment Agencies Convention, 1933 (No. 34), the necessary indications are to be found in the reports and Conference discussions relating to the earlier instruments:

(a) The initial report concerning law and practice on the question of fee-charging employment agencies, submitted to the Conference at its 16th Session in 1932, noted the wide scope of national legislation on the subject and indicated in the examination of general lines for a solution of the problem that " the function of asking for fee as an intermediary for placing workers in employment is not performed exclusively by the established commercial agencies " and that " indirect employment operations likewise carried on for gain present another feature of the trade ".[1]

(b) A similar point was made in the Committee on Fee-Charging Employment Agencies at the 16th Session of the Conference (1932). During the discussion of the questionnaire to be addressed to governments a member of the Committee pointed out that " the nature, the form or the amount of payment could not be a criterion of a fee-charging agency; fees might be charged indirectly, e.g. nurses seeking employment might be accommodated in a hostel for nurses and actually receive a small payment while they are sent out to cases for which payment is made to the hostel ".[2]

(c) The questionnaire drawn up on the basis of the Conference discussion of 1932 included several questions concerning the categories of agencies to be deemed " fee-charging employment agencies " for the purposes of the proposed Convention. In its survey of replies to the questionnaire the International Labour Office noted that " it seems clear from the replies of the governments that it is generally contemplated that the term ' agency ' should be used for the purpose of the draft Convention in its widest sense so as to comprise all forms or conditions in which placing operations are engaged in for profit " [3] and that " so far as concerns the methods of carrying on placing or recruiting operations for profit, it may be taken to be implicit that all methods which are employed for this purpose should be covered by the draft Convention ".[4] In the draft instrument submitted to the Conference a definition of " fee-charging employment agency " was accordingly proposed in which " the main element is the carrying on of placing operations with a view to profit ", and it was explained that " the intention is to give the expression ' fee-charging employment agency ' in this sense its widest scope as regards the forms which the agency may take, the frequency with which the operations are engaged in and the parties to whom the fees are charged ".[5]

(d) During the final discussion of the draft Convention at the 17th Session of the Conference in 1933 the definition of " fee-charging employment agency " proposed by the Office underwent various textual modifications, most of which are unrelated to the problem here under consideration. Two changes, however, require mentioning. The first consisted in the introduction into the definition of the words " as an intermediary " on the ground that " the idea of employment finding implied an independent intermediary between employer and worker " [6]; the intention behind this amendment was to exclude from the scope of the Convention action by an employer, or by a person in his employment, to find labour for his own purposes.[7] The other involved the replacement of the words " with a view to profit and makes any charge to either the employer or the person seeking employment " appearing in the Office draft by the words " with a view to deriving either directly or indirectly any pecuniary or other material advantage from either employer or worker ", thus emphasising the variety in forms and methods of placing for profit which it was intended to cover.

9. Further support for the view that the question whether an agency " acts as an intermediary for the purpose of procuring employment for a worker or supplying a worker for an employer " must be answered by reference to the actual nature of the transaction, rather than its form, is to be found in certain views of the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations. Thus, on several occasions the experts have concluded that labour contractors—whose activities consist in supplying workers for undertakings while generally remaining the formal employers of these workers—fall within the scope of the Convention.[1]

10. It may be concluded from all the foregoing that the Convention can apply to cases in which a contractual relationship is established between the worker and an agency, and not between the worker and the person or undertaking at whose disposal he is placed by that agency, the essential test being the nature of the transaction. The question then arises whether the transactions of agencies of the kind referred to by the Swedish Ministry of Health and Social Affairs are of such a nature as, prima facie, to bring them within the scope of the Convention.

B. Applicability of the Convention to Agencies of the Kind Referred to in the Request under Consideration

11. According to the indications supplied, the main purpose of certain agencies for hiring out labour—such as the " ambulatory typewriting agencies "—is to supply labour. Although in some cases the agency may guarantee the qualifications of the staff supplied, it assumes no other responsibility for the work. The worker is paid only while placed at the disposal of a third party and when not so placed he is free to work for any other employer. The third party at whose disposal the worker is placed decides what work is to be carried out and supervises the execution of the work. In many cases—for example when replacing employees absent on annual or sick leave or supplementing the regular workforce in cases of temporary increase in the workload—the worker becomes an integral part of the personnel of the undertaking concerned.

12. On the basis of factors such as these, it would appear that the relationship between the worker and the person or undertaking at whose disposal he is placed is such as to meet the criterion generally applied by national legal systems to determine whether an employment relationship exists, namely the power to control not only what work is to be done, but the manner in which it is to be performed.[2] It may be distinguished from cases in which not labour, but the products of labour are supplied; this distinction corresponds to the classical difference between contracts of service and contracts for services. It would thus appear to be legitimate to conclude that the agency which places the worker at the disposal of the third party " acts as an intermediary for the purpose of procuring employment for a worker or supplying a worker for an employer ".[3]

[1] The Committee observed in 1955, with reference to the application of the Convention by Pakistan, that the definition of employment agencies conducted with a view to profit in Article 1, paragraph 1 (a) of the Convention " would appear to cover the labour contractors and other recruiting agents who, according to the report of the I.L.O. Survey Mission on Labour Problems in Pakistan, act as intermediaries in the sense of this definition " (see Report of the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations, Report III (Part IV), International Labour Conference, 38th Session, Geneva, 1955, p. 75). This view was reaffirmed by the Committee in subsequent years (idem, 43rd Session, Geneva, 1959, p. 55, and 46th Session, Geneva, 1962, p. 127).

[2] See DURAND: Traité de Droit du Travail, Vol. II (Paris, 1950), p. 240; HALSBURY: Laws of England, 3rd Edition, Vol. 25, p. 498. In a case in which a worker was temporarily hired by his regular employer to a third party and the question arose which of the employers was vicariously responsible for the damage caused by the worker, the highest English Appeal Court held that the test " by which to ascertain who is the employer at any particular time is to ask who is entitled to tell the employee the way in which he is to do the work upon which he is engaged.... It is not enough that the task to be performed should be under his control, he must also control the method of performing it " (Mersey Docks and Harbour Board v. Coggins and Griffith (Liverpool) Ltd. [1947] A.C.1, p. 17).

[3] This conclusion, reached by the Swedish Supreme Court on the basis of legislation which expressly envisages that placement may be carried on by an agency having a contractual relationship with the worker concerned, was also arrived at by the Italian Court of Cassation in 1963. With regard to the case of an undertaking which, without engaging in any transformation or itself using labour, confined its activities to placing at the disposal of third parties the services of persons in its own employment the Court held that these relationships were used to conceal an activity of intermediary and were, therefore, contrary to the legislation prohibiting intermediaries in the engagement of labour (D'Alfonso v. Lucia, Currà e Fall. Soc. A.L.S.A.S., in Rivista di Diritto del Lavoro, Year XVI, Nos. 3-4 (July-Dec. 1964), p. 341).

C. Obligations Imposed by the Convention in regard to Agencies of the Kind Referred to in the Request under Consideration when Falling within Its Scope

13. Having regard to the conclusion reached in the preceding section of this memorandum that " ambulatory typewriting agencies " as described by the Swedish Ministry of Health and Social Affairs may be regarded as fee-charging employment agencies within the scope of the Fee-Charging Employment Agencies Convention (Revised), 1949, consideration of the consequences which follow in a country bound by that Convention is necessary. The position will vary according to whether the country has accepted the provisions of Part II of the Convention (providing for the progressive abolition of fee-charging employment agencies conducted with a view to profit and the regulation of other agencies) or Part III (providing for the regulation of fee-charging employment agencies).

14. As regards countries bound by Part II of the Convention, Article 3, paragraph 1, provides that " Fee-charging employment agencies conducted with a view to profit as defined in paragraph 1 (a) of Article 1 shall be abolished within a limited period of time determined by the competent authority ". This obligation is closely related to the development of a free public employment service. The preamble of the Convention states that it is " complementary to the Employment Service Convention, 1948, which provides that each Member for which the Convention is in force shall maintain or ensure the maintenance of a free public employment service " and further records the view of the Conference that " such a service should be available to all categories of workers ". Paragraph 2 of Article 3 and Article 5 of the 1949 Convention bring out the relationship between its application and the availability of a public employment service. The former provides that fee-charging employment agencies conducted with a view to profit " shall not be abolished until a public employment service is established " (subject, in the meantime, to the measures of control and supervision laid down in Article 4). Article 5 permits exceptions to the requirement of abolition of the agencies concerned in exceptional cases for exactly defined categories of persons for whom appropriate placing arrangements cannot conveniently be made within the framework of the public employment service. The Article reads as follows:

> 1. Exceptions to the provisions of paragraph 1 of Article 3 of this Convention shall be allowed by the competent authority in exceptional cases in respect of categories of persons, exactly defined by national laws or regulations, for whom appropriate placing arrangements cannot conveniently be made within the framework of the public employment service, but only after consultation, by appropriate methods, with the organisations of employers and workers concerned.
> 2. Every fee-charging employment agency for which an exception is allowed under this Article—
>
> (a) shall be subject to the supervision of the competent authority;
> (b) shall be required to be in possession of a yearly licence renewable at the discretion of the competent authority;
> (c) shall only charge fees and expenses on a scale submitted to and approved by the competent authority or fixed by the same authority;
> (d) shall only place or recruit workers abroad if permitted to do so by the competent authority and under conditions determined by the laws or regulations in force.

15. The inclusion of Article 5 was intended to provide for such special occupational categories as musicians and entertainers for whom fee-charging employment agencies exist in a large number of countries, performing functions which could not easily be taken over by the public employment service. A number of countries which have ratified the Convention make use of this exception in respect of musicians, entertainers, hotel and restaurant or domestic workers. The International Labour Office is not aware of any exception having been made in respect of a category such as part-time or casual office workers, but the possibility of such an exception would not in principle appear to be excluded. Although public services do to a certain extent cater both for vacancies of this kind and for persons seeking employment of this kind, it is possible that the arrangements do not adequately meet the needs of the persons concerned and that the public services might hesitate to undertake the additional work—testing, taking up of references, assuming responsibility for handling questions of remuneration, taxation, social security, employment permits for foreign applicants—which may make private agencies attractive both to employers and applicants for employment.

16. If it were felt necessary to have recourse to the provisions of Article 5, any exceptions would have to be confined to "categories of persons, exactly defined by national laws or regulations", in respect of whom the competent authorities were satisfied that appropriate placing arrangements could not conveniently be made within the framework of the public employment service. Before deciding upon any exception, the organisations of employers and workers concerned would have to be consulted. All exceptions would have to be subject to the measures of supervision and control specified in paragraph 2 of Article 5.

17. In the case of countries bound by Part III of the Convention, the obligations in regard to fee-charging employment agencies conducted with a view to profit are limited to measures of control and supervision. These are laid down in Article 10, and correspond to the provisions applicable under Article 5, paragraph 2, to agencies in respect of which exceptions have been made under Part II of the Convention (see text in paragraph 14 above).

Equality of Treatment (Social Security) Convention, 1962 (No. 118)

The Department of Labour of Canada requested from the International Labour Office certain information in regard to Articles 5 and 6 of the Equality of Treatment (Social Security) Convention, 1962.

With the usual reservation that the Constitution does not give him any special authority to interpret Conventions adopted by the International Labour Conference, the Director-General of the International Labour Office transmitted, on 22 December 1965, to the Department of Labour of Canada the following memorandum prepared by the International Labour Office:

Memorandum by the International Labour Office

1. The Department of Labour of Canada has requested the International Labour Office to provide certain information regarding the precise scope of Articles 5 and 6 of the Equality of Treatment (Social Security) Convention, 1962.

Article 5 of the Convention

2. This Article reads as follows:

1. In addition to the provisions of Article 4 [1], each Member which has accepted the obligations of this Convention in respect of the branch or branches of social security concerned shall guarantee both to its own nationals and to the nationals of any other Member which has accepted the obligations of the Convention in respect of the branch or branches in question,

[1] Article 4 of the Convention reads as follows:

1. Equality of treatment as regards the grant of benefits shall be accorded without any condition of residence: Provided that equality of treatment in respect of the benefits of a specified branch of social security may be made conditional on residence in the case of nationals of any Member the legislation of which makes the grant of benefits under that branch conditional on residence on its territory.

2. Notwithstanding the provisions of paragraph 1 of this Article, the grant of the benefits referred to in paragraph 6 (a) of Article 2—other than medical care, sickness benefit, employment injury benefit and family benefit—may be made subject to the condition that the beneficiary has resided on the territory of the Member in virtue of the legislation of which the benefit is due, or, in the case of a survivor, that the deceased had resided there, for a period which shall not exceed—

(a) six months immediately preceding the filing of claim, for grant of maternity benefit and unemployment benefits;

(b) five consecutive years immediately preceding the filing of claim, for grant of invalidity benefit, or immediately preceding death, for grant of survivors' benefit;

(c) ten years after the age of 18, which may include five consecutive years immediately preceding the filing of claim, for grant of old-age benefit.

3. Special provisions may be prescribed in respect of benefits granted under transitional schemes.

4. The measures necessary to prevent the cumulation of benefits shall be determined, as necessary, by special arrangements between the Members concerned.

when they are resident abroad, provision of invalidity benefits, old-age benefits, survivors' benefits and death grants, and employment injury pensions, subject to measures for this purpose being taken, where necessary, in accordance with Article 8.[1]

2. In case of residence abroad, the provision of invalidity, old-age and survivors' benefits of the type referred to in paragraph 6 (a) of Article 2 [2] may be made subject to the participation of the Members concerned in schemes for the maintenance of rights as provided for in Article 7. [3]

3. The provisions of this Article do not apply to benefits granted under transitional schemes.

3. In its request for clarification of the scope of Article 5 the Canadian Department of Labour referred to the requirement of that Article that benefits be granted to nationals and non-nationals " when they are resident abroad ", and sought confirmation that, if Canada ratified the Convention in respect of any of the branches of social security mentioned in Article 5, benefits under that branch would have to be paid to Canadian residents in Canada, or beneficiaries living in the United States or France, without any restriction.

4. Any decision as to the conformity of a country's legislation with a particular Convention must rest, in the first instance, with the government of the country concerned, subject, in case of ratification, to the procedure established by the International Labour Organisation for the examination of reports supplied by member States under article 22 of its Constitution. The present memorandum is accordingly limited to certain indications as to the scope of the relevant provisions of the Equality of Treatment (Social Security) Convention, 1962, which may facilitate the task of the government concerned in reaching a conclusion.

5. Before proceeding to an examination of the provisions of Article 5 of the Convention, it may be useful to review briefly the general structure of the instrument. Following the definitions and provisions concerning the acceptance of the Convention for individual branches of social security contained in Articles 1 and 2, Article 3 [4] lays down the general principle of equality of treatment between nationals and non-nationals and the restrictions

---

[1] Article 8 of the Convention reads as follows:

The Members for which this Convention is in force may give effect to their obligations under the provisions of Articles 5 and 7 by ratification of the Maintenance of Migrants' Pension Rights Convention, 1935, by the application of the provisions of that Convention as between particular Members by mutual agreement, or by any multilateral or bilateral agreement giving effect to these obligations.

[2] Article 2, paragraph 6*(a)*, of the Convention refers to " benefits other than those the grant of which depends either on direct financial participation by the persons protected or their employer, or on a qualifying period of occupational activity ".

[3] Article 7 of the Convention reads as follows:

1. Members for which this Convention is in force shall, upon terms being agreed between the Members concerned in accordance with Article 8, endeavour to participate in schemes for the maintenance of the acquired rights and rights in course of acquisition under their legislation of the nationals of Members for which the Convention is in force, for all branches of social security in respect of which the Members concerned have accepted the obligations of the Convention.

2. Such schemes shall provide, in particular, for the totalisation of periods of insurance, employment or residence and of assimilated periods for the purpose of the acquisition, maintenance or recovery of rights and for the calculation of benefits.

3. The cost of invalidity, old-age and survivors' benefits as so determined shall either be shared among the Members concerned, or be borne by the Member on whose territory the beneficiaries reside, as may be agreed upon by the Members concerned.

[4] Article 3 of the Convention reads as follows:

1. Each Member for which this Convention is in force shall grant within its territory to the nationals of any other Member for which the Convention is in force equality of treatment under its legislation with its own nationals, both as regards coverage and as regards the right to benefits, in respect of every branch of social security for which it has accepted the obligations of the Convention.

2. In the case of survivors' benefits, such equality of treatment shall also be granted to the survivors of the nationals of a Member for which the Convention is in force, irrespective of the nationality of such survivors.

3. Nothing in the preceding paragraphs of this Article shall require a Member to apply the provisions of these paragraphs, in respect of the benefits of a specified branch of social security, to the nationals of another Member which has legislation relating to that branch but does not grant equality of treatment in respect thereof to the nationals of the first Member.

based on reciprocity to which this principle is subject.[1] Article 4 [2] elaborates this principle by laying down the specific rule that equality of treatment as regards the grant of benefits shall be accorded without any condition of residence, also, however, subject to certain qualifications. The preparatory work preceding the adoption of the Convention brings out that Article 4 is intended to ensure—subject only to the specific exceptions which it permits—that any residence condition which may govern the grant of benefit shall apply without distinction to a ratifying State's own nationals and to nationals of any other State to whom, under Article 3, equality of treatment is due.[3] The provisions of Articles 3 and 4, dealing with the question of equality of treatment as between nationals and non-nationals, are supplemented by the provisions of Articles 5 and 6, which go beyond this aspect of the question by defining the obligations of a ratifying State regarding the payment of benefits to beneficiaries (or in respect of children) resident abroad.[4] The scope of these provisions will be examined in greater detail below.

6. As indicated above, the object of Article 5 is to guarantee the transfer to beneficiaries resident abroad of the pensions and death grants to which it relates. The following may be noted in regard to its provisions:

(a) Article 5 does not apply to all types of benefit in respect of which the obligations of the Convention may be accepted, but only to invalidity benefits, old-age benefits, survivors' benefits and death grants, and employment injury pensions;

(b) the obligations under Article 5 in respect of any particular branch of social security in respect of which a ratifying State has accepted the Convention are limited to its own nationals and the nationals of any other State which has accepted the Convention for that branch;

---

[1] It may be noted that, under Article 3, paragraph 1, formal reciprocity is required only to the extent of ratification of the Convention by the other State concerned, irrespective of whether its obligations have been accepted in respect of the same branch or branches of social security. On the other hand, Article 3, paragraph 3, permits a State to refuse equality of treatment as regards any branch of social security to nationals of another State which has legislation relating to that branch but does not grant equality of treatment in respect thereof to the nationals of the first State. The purposes underlying these provisions were explained as follows in the report of the Committee on Social Security at the 46th Session of the International Labour Conference: " The Committee considered that it was desirable, on the one hand, to extend equality of treatment within the national territory of a Member to all the branches in respect of which the said Member had ratified the Convention, for nationals of any Member who has accepted the obligations of the Convention, with the particular purpose of not placing at a disadvantage the nationals of States where social security was as yet little developed. The Committee was prepared to admit, on the other hand, that it was reasonable to include a proviso making it possible to discriminate against nationals of a Member which refuses to grant to non-nationals within its territory equality of treatment in respect of a branch of social security covered in its laws " (See Record of Proceedings, International Labour Conference, 46th Session, Geneva, 1962 (Geneva, I.L.O., 1963), para. 17, p. 755).

[2] For the text of Article 4 see footnote 1 on previous page.

[3] In commenting on the provisions which ultimately became Article 4, paragraph 1, the International Labour Office indicated that they meant that " equality of treatment of nationals and non-nationals must not be limited by a condition of residence imposed on non-nationals alone. This does not mean, however, that benefits must in all cases be accorded to non-nationals without any condition of residence, which would be paradoxical in cases where the national legislation imposes such a condition on its own nationals " (See Equality of Treatment of Nationals and Non-Nationals in Social Security, Report V (2), International Labour Conference, 46th Session, Geneva, 1962, p. 23. As regards Article 4, paragraph 2, it was at the same time noted that the periods of residence referred to in regard to benefits under certain non-contributory schemes " do not really constitute specific standards, merely stating the limits for derogations permissible in granting the benefits concerned to non-nationals ", and that " these derogations to the principle of equality of treatment could not result in more favourable treatment for foreigners than for nationals " (ibid., pp. 27 and 28).

[4] It will be noted that both Articles 5 and 6 begin with the words " In addition to the provisions of Article 4... ". These words were introduced to make it clear that the Articles in question and Article 4 lay down separate obligations in all cases where the aim of the former has not already been achieved through application of Article 4 (see Equality of Treatment of Nationals and Non-Nationals in Social Security, Report V (1), International Labour Conference, 46th Session, Geneva, 1962, p. 26, and idem, Report V (2), p. 30). It was also indicated that the provisions of paragraph 1 of Article 5, " which go beyond the strict limits of legal equality of treatment, were conceived ... in order to make it compulsory to provide the benefits listed in this paragraph to beneficiaries living abroad even in cases where national legislation does not cover such a contingency and where the provisions of Article 4 concerning equality of treatment cannot therefore serve for the same purpose ".

(c) where an obligation arises under Article 5 to pay benefits abroad, this obligation must be complied with, irrespective of where the beneficiary resides. The basic decision of principle on this question was taken during the first discussion of the Convention at the Conference in 1961, namely that " the provision of benefit abroad should be made subject to a condition of reciprocity based solely on the nationality of the beneficiary, irrespective of the situation of his country of residence with regard to the Convention ".[1] This decision was confirmed during the second discussion of the Convention in 1962, when the Committee on Social Security rejected a proposal that the obligation laid down in Article 5 should be limited to cases " where the beneficiaries were resident within the territory of a member State which had accepted the obligations of the Convention ". It was then pointed out that " it would not be fair to make the rights of the beneficiaries dependent upon their place of residence "; some members of the Committee also stressed " the social advantages of the principle of personal rights to benefit "[2];

(d) in the case of invalidity, old-age and survivors' benefits payable under non-contributory schemes, payment to beneficiaries resident abroad may, by virtue of paragraph 2 of Article 5, be made subject to the participation of the States concerned in schemes for the maintenance of rights as provided for in Article 7 [3];

(e) by virtue of paragraph 3 of the Article, the provisions of Article 5 do not apply to transitional schemes;

(f) the precise nature of the measures to be taken by governments to implement the requirements of Article 5 may vary. This is recognised in the reference in paragraph 1 to " measures for this purpose being taken, where necessary, in accordance with Article 8 ".[4]

Article 6 of the Convention

7. This Article reads as follows:

In addition to the provisions of Article 4, each Member which has accepted the obligations of this Convention in respect of family benefit shall guarantee the grant of family allowances both to its own nationals and to the nationals of any other Member which has accepted the obligations of this Convention for that branch, in respect of children who reside on the territory of any such Member, under conditions and within limits to be agreed upon by the Members concerned.

8. In its request for clarification of the above provisions the Canadian Department of Labour referred in particular to the words " children who reside on the territory of any such Member " and inquired whether the Member mentioned in this phrase was the State granting the allowances, the State of nationality of the beneficiary, or a third ratifying State. With reference to the final phrase of the Article (" under conditions and within limits to be agreed upon by the Members concerned "), clarification was sought as to the obligation of a ratifying State to negotiate bilateral agreements with the other States concerned if the latter wished to conclude such an agreement.

9. As already indicated, Article 6 goes beyond the obligations laid down in Articles 3 and 4 of the Convention dealing with equality of treatment as between nationals and non-nationals in the strict sense, by defining the obligations of a ratifying State regarding the payment of family benefit in respect of children resident abroad. The following points may be noted in regard to its provisions:

(a) Article 6 applies only to States which have accepted the obligations of the Convention in respect of family benefit;

---

[1] See Report V (1), op. cit., para. 39, p. 12, and Report V (2), op. cit., p. 32.

[2] See Record of Proceedings, op. cit., para. 34, p. 757.

[3] For the text of Article 7 see footnote 3 on p. 397.

[4] It was considered unnecessary to add to the paragraph a mention, as suggested by one government, that its requirements might be met by unilateral decision, since it was considered clear that this was one of the methods by which its provisions could be implemented (see Report V (2), op. cit., p. 31).

(b) as in the case of Article 5, the obligations of a ratifying State under Article 6 are limited to its own nationals and the nationals of any other State which has accepted the obligations of the Convention in respect of the branch concerned (i.e. family benefit);

(c) in contrast to Article 5, which requires benefits within its scope to be paid wherever the beneficiary resides, Article 6 requires family allowances to be paid only in respect of children who reside on the territory of a State having accepted the obligations of the Convention in respect of family benefit. The discussions in the Committee on Social Security in 1962 show that the reference in Article 6 to residence " on the territory of any such Member " was intended to cover residence on the territory either of the State granting the allowances or of any other State having accepted the obligations of the Convention in respect of family benefit.[1] This meaning is made explicit in the French text of the Convention, which refers to children residing " sur le territoire de l'un de ces Membres " (" on the territory of any one of these Members ") [2];

(d) the allowances mentioned in Article 6 are to be granted " under conditions and within limits to be agreed upon by the Members concerned ". The report of the Committee on Social Security at the 46th Session of the Conference indicated that the aim of the Article was not to establish " a direct obligation arising only from the ratification of the Convention, but merely an indirect obligation, conditional on the conclusion of agreements among the member States concerned as to the conditions and the limits within which the guarantee referred to should be applied ". The Committee further indicated that this obligation was conceived in the same spirit as that contained in Article 7, which implied " that the Members concerned should undertake to apply the principle stated in this Article by reaching an agreement to this effect whatever its nature or form, and that the failure to reach such agreement, duly noted, should not be construed as a failure to carry out the contractual obligations contained in the Article ".[3] As generally in relation to the implementation of obligations under international instruments, the States concerned would have to endeavour in good faith to reach agreement on the subject-matter of Article 6, and their action in this regard would be subject to examination by the bodies responsible for supervising the application of ratified Conventions;

(e) it is to be noted that Article 6 does not cover all family benefits, but only " family allowances ". When it was inserted by the Committee on Social Security during the second discussion of the Convention in 1962, it was noted that the expression " family allowances " was used to cover " periodical payments granted as compensation for expenditure for the maintenance of children, exclusive of certain special allowances, especially those granted to mothers remaining at home " [4];

(f) finally, it may be noted that Article 6 covers both contributory and non-contributory benefits.

10. In conclusion, it would appear that a State which accepts the obligations of the Convention in respect of family benefit would have to seek in good faith to conclude agreements with other States which have accepted the Convention in respect of that branch, with a view to ensuring, on the conditions and within the limits laid down in such agreements, that family allowances are granted to its own nationals and to the nationals of any such other Member in respect of children who reside on its own territory or on the territory of any other State which has accepted the obligations of the Convention in respect of family benefit.

[1] See Record of Proceedings, op. cit., para. 37, p. 758.

[2] Under Art. 21 of the Convention the English and French versions are equally authoritative.

[3] See Record of Proceedings, op. cit., para. 37, p. 758. It may be noted that certain Model Clauses for multilateral or bilateral agreements were appended to the Proposed Recommendation concerning equality of treatment of nationals and non-nationals in social security (which was not adopted for lack of a quorum) with a view to facilitating the conclusion of agreements of the kind mentioned above. However, it was repeatedly stressed, and recalled in the preamble to the Model Clauses themselves, that they " were intended purely as a guide and that Members might make use of them in full or in part according to their needs " (ibid., para. 66, p. 762, and Annex to the Proposed Recommendation, preamble, p. 767).

[4] Ibid., para. 37, p. 758.

11. A final consideration which may be borne in mind in regard to the application of the Convention generally, including the provisions which have been reviewed in this memorandum, is the possibility of flexibility provided by Article 9 of the Convention, which reads as follows:

The provisions of this Convention may be derogated from by agreements between Members which do not affect the rights and duties of other Members and which make provision for the maintenance of rights in course of acquisition and of acquired rights under conditions at least as favourable on the whole as those provided for in this Convention.

INFORMATION

Membership of the International Labour Organisation

Nepal

On 30 August 1966 the Director-General of the International Labour Office received the following communication:

Kathmandu, 18 August 1966.

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you on behalf of His Majesty's Government of Nepal that the Kingdom of Nepal hereby formally accepts the obligations of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation in accordance with paragraph 3 of article 1 of the Constitution of the Organisation, and solemnly undertakes fully and faithfully to perform each and every of the provisions thereof.

His Majesty's Government shall bear their share of the expenses of the International Labour Organisation in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution of the Organisation, and make the necessary arrangements concerning their financial contribution with the Governing Body.

Accept, Sir, the assurances of my highest consideration.

(Signed) Kirti Nidhi BISTA,
Minister for Foreign Affairs.

This communication was acknowledged by the Director-General on 31 August 1966.

As appears from the information given above, Nepal, which is a Member of the United Nations, became a Member of the International Labour Organisation on 30 August 1966 by virtue of article 1, paragraph 3, of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation.

Indonesia

In the report on the 162nd Session of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office [1] it was indicated that Indonesia had given notice of its intention to withdraw from the International Labour Organisation. That notice was received on 25 March 1965 and would, in accordance with article 1, paragraph 5, of the Constitution of the Organisation, have taken effect on 25 March 1967.

[1] See Official Bulletin, Vol. XLVIII, No. 3, July 1965, p. 233.

On 6 September 1966 the Director-General of the International Labour Office received the following communication:

Djakarta, 6 August 1966.

Sir,

By letter of 8 March 1965 the Government of Indonesia submitted a notice of withdrawal of the Republic of Indonesia from the International Labour Organisation. It was emphasised in that letter that Indonesia would continue to uphold the lofty principles of international co-operation as laid down in the Constitution of the I.L.O. though it felt constrained at that stage and under then prevailing circumstances to withdraw its membership from the International Labour Organisation.

I am now happy to inform you on behalf of my Government that Indonesia is ready to resume active participation in the work of the International Labour Organisation. I would accordingly be grateful if you would regard this letter as superseding the notice of withdrawal of 8 March 1965 which has not yet taken effect.

The Republic of Indonesia confirms its formal acceptance of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation.

Accept, Sir, the assurances of my highest consideration.

(Signed) Adam MALIK,
Minister for Foreign Affairs.

This communication was acknowledged by the Director-General on 8 September 1966.

As appears from the information given above, Indonesia's membership in the International Labour Organisation will continue without interruption.

Implementation of Instruments Adopted by the International Labour Conference [1]

Constitution of the International Labour Organisation Instruments of Amendment (Nos. 1 and 3), 1964 [2]

Ratifications or Acceptances

The following ratification of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation Instruments of Amendment (Nos. 1 and 3), 1964, has been communicated to the Director-General of the International Labour Office.

ITALY

The ratification by Italy of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation Instruments of Amendment (Nos. 1 and 3), 1964, was received by the Director-General of the International Labour Office on 12 July 1966.

The instrument of ratification of these texts is as follows:

(Translation)

THE PRESIDENT OF THE REPUBLIC

To all those to whom these presents may come, greeting!

An Amendment No. 1 and an Amendment No. 3 to the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation having been adopted at Geneva respectively on 6 and on 9 July 1964, and consisting of the following text:

[Here follows the text of the Instruments of Amendment.]

We, having seen the said Amendments and approving them in all and every part, have accepted, ratified and confirmed them, and do now hereby accept, ratify and confirm them and promise to observe them and ensure their strict observance.

In faith whereof, We sign these presents with Our hand and have affixed Our seal thereto.

Done at Rome this tenth day of June in the year nineteen hundred and sixty-six.

(Signed) Giuseppe SARAGAT.

Ratifications of International Labour Conventions and Declarations concerning the Application of Conventions to Non-Metropolitan Territories

[NOTE: The publication of information concerning the ratification and application of international labour Conventions does not imply any expression of view by the International Labour Office on the legal status of the State having communicated a ratification or declaration, or on its authority over the territories in respect of which such ratification or declaration is made; in certain cases these may present problems on which the I.L.O. is not competent to express an opinion.]

BRAZIL

Ratification of the Radiation Protection Convention, 1960 (No. 115), and the Final Articles Revision Convention, 1961 (No. 116).

The ratification by Brazil of Conventions Nos. 115 and 116 was registered by the Director-General of the International Labour Office on 5 September 1966.

The text of the instrument of ratification of these Conventions is as follows:

(Translation)

I, Humberto de Alencar CASTELLO BRANCO,

President of the Republic of the United States of Brazil,

Hereby inform all those who see the present instrument of ratification that at the 44th and 45th Sessions of the General Conference of the International Labour Organisation, there were adopted, on 22 June 1960 and 26 June 1961 respectively, Convention No. 115 concerning the protection of workers against ionising radiations and Convention No. 116 concerning the partial revision of the Conventions adopted by the General Conference of the International Labour Office at its first 32 sessions for the purpose of standardising the provisions regarding the preparation of reports by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office on the working of Conventions, the originals of which are deposited with the Office of the said Organisation;

And the National Congress having approved the foregoing Conventions by means of Legislative Decree No. 2 of 1964, I hereby ratify them, declare them to be fully effective and undertake that they shall be inviolably observed;

In faith whereof, I have signed these presents and affixed thereto the seal of the Republic and have caused them to be countersigned by the Minister of State for Foreign Affairs.

Given in the Palace of the President in Brasilia on the twenty-fifth day of May, nineteen hundred and sixty-four in the hundred and forty-third year of Independence and the seventy-sixth year of the Republic.

(Signed) H. CASTELLO BRANCO.
(Countersigned) V. DA CUNHA.

In conformity with Article 3, paragraph 3 (c), of the Radiation Protection Convention, 1960 (No. 115), the following declaration was appended to the instrument of ratification:

(Translation)

1. Broadly speaking, Brazilian legislation on the protection of workers against ionising radiations covers two categories of workers: firstly, civilian or military employees of the Federal Government and employees of autonomous public corporations, and secondly, workers subject to the Consolidated Labour Laws.

2. The first group—employees of the Federal Government—are partly covered by Act No. 1234 dated 14 November 1950 and the regulations issued thereunder, which refer solely to occupational exposure to radiation, i.e. cases where workers are directly exposed to radiation because of the special nature of their employment.

Act No. 1234 entitles these workers to a special bonus, shorter working hours, additional holidays and facilities for sick leave in the event of occupational injury or disease, while the regulations issued thereunder contain health and safety standards, exposure tables and details concerning the arrangements for enforcement and supervision.

3. The second group—workers subject to the Consolidated Labour Laws—are not covered by any legislation specifically dealing with protection against ionising radiations, but are covered by certain general provisions, namely:

3.1. Cash bonuses are payable to workers employed in conditions classified as unhealthy under Legislative Decree No. 2162 dated 1 May 1940 and section 187 of the Consolidated Labour Laws; in addition, Order No. 262 of the Ministry of Labour and Social Welfare dated 6 August 1962 lays down maximum and average standards of toxicity for various occupations involving exposure to ionising radiations. Act No. 4589 dated 11 December 1964 gives the National Department of Occupational Safety and Health, which forms part of the Ministry of Labour and Social Welfare, powers to regulate occupational safety and health standards and to classify certain conditions as unhealthy. The same enactment makes the department of labour in each state responsible for enforcing its provisions in its own area.

3.2. Under Act No. 3807 dated 26 August 1960 (the Social Insurance Act) special retirement conditions are granted to workers exposed to ionising radiations; details are given in Decree No. 53831 dated 25 March 1964.

3.3. Details concerning compensation and other benefits in the event of occupational disease are given in Legislative Decree No. 4449 dated 9 July 1942 and Decree No. 1361 dated 12 January 1937, which also apply to diseases caused by ionising radiations.

Order No. 10 was issued by the Director of the Actuarial Department of the Ministry of Labour and Social Welfare on 23 November 1964 approving the schedule of occupational diseases given in the sole paragraph of section 2 of Legislative Decree No. 7036 dated 10 November 1944 and section 102 (a) of the regulations issued thereunder, approved by Decree No. 18809 dated 5 June 1945, Part XIV of which classifies all diseases caused by ionising radiations as occupational in character.

3.4. Work in occupations involving the use of ionising radiations for medical purposes, as well as the conditions in which such work is performed, are subject to approval and supervision by the National Medical and Pharmaceutical Control Department of the Ministry of Health.

4. General safety standards concerning ionising radiations and, in particular, the prescribing of maximum permissible doses and standards for the marking and transport of radioactive materials, are at present the responsibility of the National Nuclear Energy Commission, which has power to set and enforce standards at the federal level (Act No. 4118 dated 27 August 1962), but has not yet issued any instructions in this respect.

In the absence of any specific Brazilian legislation and in view of the principle that ratified Conventions have the status of national legislation, Brazil observes the recommendations of the International Atomic Energy Agency, to which it belongs by virtue of Legislative Decree No. 42155 dated 27 August 1957 issued in pursuance of Legislative Decree No. 24 dated 24 July 1957.

CYPRUS

Ratification of the Employment Injury Benefits Convention, 1964 (No. 121), and the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122).

The ratification by Cyprus of Conventions Nos. 121 and 122 was registered by the Director-General of the International Labour Office on 28 July 1966.

The communications from the Minister of Labour and Social Insurance which constitute the instruments of ratification of these Conventions are in terms similar to those of the communication which constitutes the instrument of ratification of the Unemployment Convention, 1919 (No. 2).[1]

MEXICO

Declaration concerning the Weekly Rest (Commerce and Offices) Convention, 1957 (No. 106).

The ratification by Mexico of Convention No. 106 was registered by the Director-General of the International Labour Office on 1 June 1959. Following this ratification, the Mexican Government has communicated, in conformity with Article 3, paragraph 1, of the Convention, a declaration specifying that the provisions of the Convention shall also apply to persons employed in the establishments referred to in the said paragraph. This declaration was registered on 29 June 1966.

NETHERLANDS

Ratification of the Employment Injury Benefits Convention, 1964 (No. 121).

The ratification by the Netherlands of Convention No. 121 was registered by the Director-General of the International Labour Office on 2 August 1966.

The text of the instrument of ratification of this Convention is in terms similar to those of the instrument of ratification of the Sickness Insurance (Industry) Convention, 1927 (No. 24).[1]

NIGER

Ratification of the Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100), and the Social Security (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1952 (No. 102).

The ratification by Niger of Conventions Nos. 100 and 102 was registered by the Director-General of the International Labour Office on 9 August 1966.

The text of the communication from the Minister of the Civil Service and Labour, which constitutes the instrument of ratification of these Conventions, is as follows:

(Translation)

Niamey, 4 August 1966.

Sir,

With reference to your letter ACD 2-201 dated 26 July 1966, I have the honour to confirm that the Government of the Republic of Niger has ratified the following international labour Conventions:

Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100).

Social Security (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1952 (No. 102).

With regard to Convention No. 102, I wish to add, in accordance with Article 2 (b) of the instrument in question, that ratification applies to the following parts:

V — old-age benefit,

VI — employment injury benefit,

VII — family benefit,

VIII — maternity benefit.

I shall be obliged if you will consider the present communication as a formal instrument of ratification of the foregoing Conventions in accordance with article 19, paragraph 5 (d), of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation.

With the assurance of my highest consideration,

(Signed) AMADOU ISSAKA,
Minister of the Civil Service and Labour.

NORWAY

Conditional Ratification of the Wages, Hours of Work and Manning (Sea) Convention (Revised), 1958 (No. 109).

The conditional ratification by Norway of Convention No. 109 was registered by the Director-General of the International Labour Office on 30 August 1966. This ratification is subject to the condition that the Convention will become applicable to Norway after its entry into force for Denmark, the Federal Republic of Germany, Sweden and the United Kingdom.

The text of the instrument of ratification is as follows:

(Translation)

We, OLAV,

King of Norway,

Hereby make known:

That having seen and examined the Convention concerning wages, hours of work on board ship and manning (revised 1958), adopted by the General Conference of the International Labour Organisation at its 41st Session in 1958,

We approve, ratify and confirm the said Convention and undertake to ensure that it is observed according to its form and tenor.

The ratification does not apply to Part II, Wages.

The ratification shall not be considered effective until the said Convention has entered into force in all the following countries: Denmark, the Federal Republic of Germany, Sweden and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland.

In faith whereof we have signed the present instrument of ratification and caused the seal of the Kingdom to be affixed thereto.

Done at the Royal Palace in Oslo on the twenty-fifth day of March One thousand nine hundred and sixty-six.

In the absence of His Majesty the King:

(Signed) HARALD.

(Countersigned) John LYNG,

Minister of Foreign Affairs.

Reports Prepared for the International Labour Conference (51st Session)

In preparation for the 51st Session of the International Labour Conference (June 1967) the International Labour Office has published the following report.

Revision of Conventions Nos. 35, 36, 37, 38, 39 and 40 concerning Old-Age, Invalidity and Survivors' Pensions [2]

The first chapter of the present report summarises the proceedings of the 50th Session of the Conference relating to the revision of Conventions Nos. 35, 36, 37, 38, 39 and 40 concerning old-age, invalidity and survivors' pensions (extracts from the report of the Conference Committee, Proposed Conclusions submitted by the Committee, discussion by the Conference in plenary sitting). The second chapter contains the text of a proposed Convention and a proposed Recommendation prepared by the Office on the basis of the Proposed Conclusions.

Studies and Reports

Prices, Wages and Incomes Policies in Industrialised Market Economies [3]

This study concerns certain problems of wage policy in industrialised countries aiming at high employment and steady growth of production and incomes, largely in the framework of a market economy. Its chapters cover the following subjects: wages and economic stability; effects of inflation; causes of inflation and the fixing of prices and wages; some mechanics of inflation; wage policy—methods and institutions; criteria of wage adjustment in national wage policy; some problems of national wage policy; policy for non-wage incomes; and steps towards stability—improving wage systems.

The main purpose of the study is to stimulate thought and discussion on a number of important and controversial questions. The views expressed are those of the authors and not necessarily those of the I.L.O.

Judgments Given by the Administrative Tribunal of the International Labour Organisation

Text of the Judgment Given in the Case of: Deschamps against International Labour Organisation

INTERNATIONAL LABOUR ORGANISATION

ADMINISTRATIVE TRIBUNAL

Sixteenth Ordinary Session (Geneva, 1-11 October 1966)

Registry's translation, the French text alone being authoritative.

In re Deschamps — Judgment No. 91

The Administrative Tribunal,

Considering the complaint against the International Labour Organisation drawn up by Mr. Roger Deschamps, dated 30 July 1965 and actually despatched, accordingly to the postmark, on 9 August 1965, the reply of the I.L.O. dated 10 November 1965, the rejoinder of the complainant dated 15 February and 31 March 1966, and the observations of the I.L.O. on this rejoinder, dated 26 April 1966;

Considering article VII, paragraph 2, of the Statute of the Tribunal, together with article 6, paragraph 3, of the Rules of Court of the Tribunal;

Having examined the documents in the dossier, oral proceedings having neither been requested by the parties nor ordered by the Tribunal and the complainant's offer to appear personally being unnecessary to the disposition of the case;

Considering that the material facts of the case are as follows:

A. After discharging the duties of textiles handicraft expert in Morocco for the I.L.O., the complainant, whose original appointment, made for one year on 12 April 1959, had been extended on successive occasions, was appointed on 1 December 1962 for a period of 11 months as principal textiles expert in a project for training textile and leather-work instructors which was an extension of the project to which he had previously been assigned.

B. Differences arose between the complainant and the head of this new project, who had taken up his appointment in March 1963, as a result of which Mr. Deschamps addressed a memorandum to the Resident Representative of the Technical Assistance Board at Rabat on 2 May 1963, setting out his grievances and indicating his intention of submitting a complaint to the Director-General of the I.L.O. and, possibly, of requesting its transmission to the Administrative Tribunal. The Resident Representative advised Mr. Deschamps not to institute proceedings and no further action was taken on the matter by either party.

C. On 10 May 1963 the complainant was informed that the I.L.O. did not propose to renew his appointment, and when the complainant expressed surprise at such a decision which appeared to indicate lack of confidence in him, whereas reports on his work had never been anything but favourable and the project was to continue for several years longer, he was informed, on 14 June 1963, that under article 4.6 (d) of the I.L.O. Staff Regulations, while fixed-term appointments were renewable, " an official thus appointed is not entitled to assume that his contract will be renewed or that it will be converted into a different type of contract ", and that " fixed-term appointments terminate without notice at the date specified in the contract of employment ". The complainant's service came to an end on 31 October 1963 and, although he states that in the course of a visit to Geneva he handed a copy of his note of 2 May to the Chief of the Technical Service to which he was responsible, he made no formal appeal.

D. On 28 January 1965 the complainant wrote to the Director-General of the I.L.O. stating that after having accepted the decision taken he had learnt that the Chief of the Mission and one of his former colleagues had been relieved of their duties after a year's service, and that this afforded a presumption of the falsity of the slanderous reports made by those persons in respect of the complainant, to which reports he attributed the non-renewal of his appointment. Consequently he asked for a review of his case and requested " that his file should be purged of the dishonest statements which had been the cause of an unfair decision ". On 25 February 1965 he was sent a reply pointing out that the documents in his file, and particularly his last annual report, contained favourable evaluations, so that the reference to " dishonest statements " of which Mr. Deschamps's record should be " purged " was difficult to understand.

E. On 15 April 1965 the complainant pressed his request and mentioned his wish to bring the matter before the Tribunal, and on 30 April 1965 he was informed of the procedure to be followed for that purpose. Following a letter addressed to the President of the Tribunal on 23 May 1965 setting out the complainant's grievances and his desire to submit them to the Tribunal, the Statute and Rules of Court of the Tribunal and the forms for submission of complaints were sent to the complainant on 28 May, and a complaint was filed, dated 30 July 1965 and actually despatched on 9 August 1965. The complainant prays the Tribunal to recognise that he had given notice of his case on 2 May 1963, that the absence of offers of further appointments which he had hoped to receive confirmed that he had been arbitrarily dismissed, that this dismissal was in contradiction with the favourable evaluation of his services made on 25 February 1965, and asks that the points raised in his letter to the President of the Tribunal be considered. The International Labour Organisation prays that the complaint be dismissed as irreceivable, both because of the nature of the relief sought by the complainant and because of the late submission of the complaint.

Considerations

1. Article VII, paragraph 2, of the Statute of the Tribunal provides that to be receivable a complaint must have been filed within 90 days after the complainant was notified of the decision impugned.

2. The complaint was drawn up on 30 July 1965 and despatched on 9 August 1965, the latter date alone being taken into account for the application of article VII, paragraph 2, of the Statute of the Tribunal, as provided by article 6, paragraph 3, of the Rules of Court. It follows that, whatever may be the decision actually impugned, the complaint was filed more than 90 days after the notification of the last of these decisions, and accordingly is not receivable.

3. The complainant's statement of his grievances against his chief which he submitted to the Resident Representative in Rabat on 2 May 1963 could not have the effect of bringing the matter before the Tribunal, since it referred only to a possible intention and, moreover, was not meant for the Tribunal itself.

4. In so far as the complaint might relate to the legality of the non-renewal of the complainant's appointment, the decision not to renew his appointment was communicated to the complainant on 10 May 1963 and took effect on 31 October 1963.

5. In so far as the complaint might relate to the I.L.O.'s letter of 25 February 1965, even assuming that this might have implied a new decision relating to the request for the removal of certain documents from the complainant's personal file, rather than confirmation of the decision not to renew his contract which, being a confirmatory decision, could not have formed the starting point for the time limit within which an appeal must be filed, it is sufficient to note that any such time limit ran from 25 February 1965.

6. It is likewise to no purpose that the complainant pleads ignorance of the conditions governing the filing of appeals to the Tribunal, since he had been furnished at the time of his appointment with a copy of the I.L.O. Staff Regulations, article 13.2 of which provides for appeal to the Administrative Tribunal " as provided in the Statute of the Tribunal ". Moreover, when provided with a copy of the Statute of the Tribunal itself, the complainant still allowed more than 90 days to elapse before filing his complaint.

7. As regards the arguments based on equity which the complainant puts forward in favour of a review of his grievances, the Tribunal cannot take these arguments into account since the time limit provided for in the Statute of the Tribunal is mandatory; it is binding on the complainant and cannot be extended by the Tribunal.

DECISION

For the above reasons,

The complaint is dismissed as irreceivable.

In witness of this judgment, delivered in public sitting in Geneva on 11 October 1966 by Mr. Maxime Letourneur, President, Mr. André Grisel, Vice-President, and the Right Honourable Lord Devlin, P.C., Judge, the aforementioned have hereunto subscribed their signatures, as well as myself, Lemoine, Registrar of the Tribunal.

Text of the Judgment Given in the Case of: Varlocosta-Patrono against Food and Agriculture Organisation of the United Nations

INTERNATIONAL LABOUR ORGANISATION

ADMINISTRATIVE TRIBUNAL

Sixteenth Ordinary Session (Geneva, 1-11 October 1966)

Registry's translation, the French text alone being authoritative.

In re Varlocosta-Patrono — Judgment No. 92

The Administrative Tribunal,

Considering the complaint against the Food and Agriculture Organisation of the United Nations drawn up by Mrs. Anna Varlocosta-Patrono on 9 September 1965, brought into conformity with the Rules of Court on 21 September 1965, and the Organisation's reply of 14 December 1965;

Considering article VIII of the Statute of the Tribunal, articles 301.00 and 301.0913 of the F.A.O. Staff Regulations, and sections 314.221, 340.231, 331.332 and 303.138 of the F.A.O. Manual;

Having heard in public sitting, on 4 October 1966, Mr. Jacques Mercier, counsel for the complainant, and Mr. G. Saint-Pol, agent of the Organisation;

Considering that the material facts of the case are as follows:

A. The complainant entered the service of F.A.O. on 23 September 1956 as a stenographer under a contract of indefinite duration. She was assigned successively to 32 different posts for periods of varying but generally short duration, and none of the services to which she was assigned wished to keep her on permanent assignment. The reports on her work vary, but several of them are unfavourable.

B. In the course of her employment the complainant was given several warnings. On 28 November 1960 she was informed that in spite of certain hesitations she would be granted her annual increment, but that if her performance continued to fall short of the normal standard the question of her continued employment by F.A.O. would arise. As shown by a memorandum of 20 October 1964, the complainant was informed that if she did not secure a permanent assignment her appointment would have to be terminated. Furthermore, the annual increment due to her on 1 September 1964 was withheld.

C. On 29 December 1964 the complainant was informed that as she had never been selected for permanent assignment to any post she could no longer continue to act merely as a replacement and that her appointment would therefore be terminated on 31 January 1965 in the interests of the Organisation, under Staff Regulation 301.0913.

D. The complainant appealed to the Director-General, and by a decision of 1 February 1965, the decision to terminate her appointment was confirmed, but on the ground of unsatisfactory service in virtue of section 314.221 of the F.A.O. Manual, while the period of notice was altered to begin as from the date of this new decision. The new decision was based on the same facts as the previous one.

E. The complainant appealed to the Appeals Committee of F.A.O., which recommended that the decision to terminate the appointment should be confirmed, but on the ground of the interests of the Organisation instead of unsatisfactory service. This recommendation was accepted by the Director-General, and on 9 June 1965 the complainant was informed that her appointment had been terminated under Staff Regulation 301.0913, as specified in the original decision, and no longer for unsatisfactory service.

F. In her complaint to the Tribunal the complainant prays for the rescinding of the sections of the F.A.O. Manual under which she had been refused access to the full text of the Appeals Committee report, and the production of various documents, and for the quashing of the decision to terminate her appointment, on the ground of incorrect application of Staff Regulation 301.0913 which had been invoked to effect in a disguised manner the termination of her appointment for unsatisfactory service, which termination was unjustified, and of the retroactive character of the decision of 9 June 1965. The Organisation prays the Tribunal to dismiss the complaint.

CONSIDERATIONS

On the production of documents:

1. The complainant has requested the production of various documents, namely the reports relating to her service in the Organisation, an offer of employment on the World Food Programme, and the full text of the report of the Appeals Committee to the Director-General. The Organisation has complied with these requests, a fact which the complainant does not deny.

On the rescinding of section 331.332 of the Administrative Manual of the Organisation:

2. Section 340.231 of the Organisation's Manual distinguishes between two kinds of documents classified as " restricted material ", namely " privileged " and " non-privileged " material. Unlike " non-privileged " material, " privileged " material marked " confidential " may not be communicated to staff members. In accordance with Manual section 331.332 the reports of the Appeals Committee are classified as " privileged restricted ". Moreover, while Manual section 303.138 provides for the communication to the officials concerned of the recommendations in Appeals Committee reports, it makes no mention of the communication of the reasons on which these recommendations were based.

3. The complainant's request for the rescinding of section 331.332 is not receivable. Under article VIII of its Statute, the Administrative Tribunal may order the rescinding of the decision impugned or the performance of the obligation relied upon. There is nowhere any reference to the rescinding of a general provision, by whomsoever it may have been issued. Hence, when a complainant prays for the rescinding of such a provision, the Administrative Tribunal must confine itself to considering the legality of the provision and, if it is found to be invalid, to rescinding the decision by which it was applied or the consequential decisions. Thus, in the present case the Tribunal must consider whether, as the complainant claims, section 331.332 is in contradiction with a general principle of law, and if so, whether the decision impugned should consequently be rescinded.

4. It is, of course, a general principle that every official has the right to be heard before a final decision detrimental to his interests is taken. This right applies even where not expressed in a definite text, and it implies that every official shall have the opportunity of consulting the documents needed to defend his legitimate interests. In particular, an official who is the subject of a decision which can be brought before the Administrative Tribunal may require access to all the documents on which that decision was based, and specifically to the full text of the Appeals Committee's report to the Director-General. It is in fact the examination of this report that will enable him to make an informed estimate of his chances of a successful appeal to the Administrative Tribunal. It is unnecessary to consider whether the Organisation might, in clearly exceptional circumstances, withhold from the official concerned certain parts of the report which it regarded as confidential, since in the present case there was obviously nothing secret in any part of the report which has been produced.

5. It follows from what is said above that in transmitting to the complainant only the recommendations of the report, without the reasons stated therein, the Organisation ignored the official's right to be heard. The violation of this right cannot, however, entail the rescinding of the decision impugned unless it actually affected the sense of the decision. In other words, the complainant cannot base her claim on the refusal to allow her access to the full report of the Appeals Committee unless she would either have been discouraged by the report from filing her complaint with the Administrative Tribunal, or have been deprived of the possibility of defending her legitimate interests before the Tribunal. However, neither of these possibilities arises. Even if she had been informed of the contents of the report as a whole the complainant would certainly have filed the present complaint, which is based on arguments quite unconnected with those put forward by the Appeals Committee. On the other hand, as a result of the production of the full report during the present proceedings the complainant has been able to rely on it to submit any arguments which she considered suitable to support her claim. It follows that, while the right to be heard was ignored, at the administrative proceedings stage, this did not in fact affect the sense of the decision complained of and, consequently, does not involve the quashing of that decision.

On the decision concerning termination:

6. Under Staff Regulation 301.0913 the Director-General may terminate the appointment of a staff member who, like the complainant, holds an appointment of indefinite duration if in his opinion such action would be in the interests of the Organisation. In accordance with Staff Regulation 301.00 the Director-General specified the scope of Staff Regulation 301.0913 by inserting into the Manual a Regulation 314.221, which provides that a staff member whose services are unsatisfactory may be terminated after a written warning.

7. Although the complainant has produced a certain number of favourable reports, it is clear from several other documents that during her eight years of service in the Organisation she had had 32 assignments, without ever having attained the standard of competence proper to her grade, that she had thus shown herself to be unfit for any permanent assignment, and that before the first decision to terminate her appointment she had received written warning of the consequences of her unsuitability, in particular by a memorandum of 2 October 1964. It follows that the complainant could legitimately have been terminated for unsatisfactory service under Staff Regulation 314.221.

8. While it is true that the Director-General abandoned his reliance on this regulation, to which he had referred in his earlier decision, and based the decision impugned on Staff Regulation 301.0913, it should be noted that the complainant not only agreed to this change of motivation, but herself requested it. In her memorandum to the Appeals Committee, after criticising the date at which her services were terminated, she complained of having been terminated on 1 February 1965 for unsatisfactory services and thus having been, as it were, penalised for having appealed against the first decision based on Staff Regulation 301.0913. Still more, while claiming that " the slur of unsatisfactory service " was in no way justified, she begged that she should be freed from this reproach which might reduce her chances of finding employment in another organisation. She thus implicitly asked that if the termination of her appointment were to be maintained it should be based on Staff Regulation 301.0913. It is hardly fitting, therefore, that she should now challenge the application of this provision.

On the retroactivity of the decision impugned:

9. Although the decision impugned is based on Staff Regulation 301.0913, whereas that of 1 February 1965 refers to Staff Regulation 314.221, both these decisions are based on the same facts and provide for the termination of the complainant's appointment. The last decision, taken as a result of the complainant's appeal and after recommendation of the Appeals Committee, confirms the solution adopted earlier. In taking this decision on 9 June 1965, therefore, the Director-General acted correctly in fixing the date previously decided upon, namely 5 March 1965, as the date at which the complainant's services should terminate. Contrary to the complainant's submission, the maintenance of this date did not result in giving retroactive effect to the decision impugned.

DECISION

For the above reasons,

The complaint is dismissed.

Text of the Judgment Given in the Case of: Saini against Food and Agriculture Organisation of the United Nations

INTERNATIONAL LABOUR ORGANISATION

ADMINISTRATIVE TRIBUNAL

Sixteenth Ordinary Session (Geneva, 1-11 October 1966)

In re Saini Judgment No. 93

The Administrative Tribunal,

Considering the complaint against the Food and Agriculture Organisation of the United Nations, drawn up by Mr. T. S. Saini on 3 November 1965, and the Organisation's reply of 27 May 1966;

Considering article VIII of the Statute of the Tribunal, article 301.136 of the Staff Regulations of F.A.O. and section 370.831 of the F.A.O. Manual, as well as Staff Rule 303.131;

Having disallowed the hearing of witnesses prayed for by complainant as being unnecessary for the disposition of the present case;

Having heard, in oral proceedings, on 3 and 4 October 1966, Mr. Jacques Mercier, counsel for the complainant, and Mr. G. Saint-Pol, agent of the Organisation, as well as Mr. Saini, who was questioned by the Tribunal;

Considering that the material facts of the case are as follows:

A. Complainant entered the service of the Organisation on 6 January 1962 and, after serving in the Sudan and subsequently in Rome, was then given a fixed-term appointment, in the next higher grade, to serve as a forestry expert in Jordan from 1 January 1964 to 5 January 1967.

B. In the course of the year 1964, difficulties arose between complainant and the manager of the project to which Mr. Saini was assigned, which gave rise to an extensive correspondence, visits to Jordan by headquarters officials, and discussions at headquarters with the project manager, and the Organisation states that, in view of the deterioration of the relationship between the complainant and his chief, it came to the conclusion that one or both officials should be removed from Jordan and reassigned.

C. When complainant visited Rome on 22 and 23 December 1964, on the occasion of his return from home leave, he was informed orally of the decision to reassign him and was instructed to return to Amman for the period necessary to complete his field work and to wind up his personal affairs, whereafter he would return to Rome for analysing the data collected in Jordan and for reassignment. Complainant accepted this arrangement and returned to Amman.

D. After his return to Amman, the Organisation, on the advice of the Resident Representative in Amman, notified complainant that he should return to Rome not later than 25 January 1965. During the same period, complainant pressed his complaints against the project manager, and the Resident Representative urged F.A.O. to call both the project manager and Mr. Saini to Rome, and to give the latter an opportunity to state his case. Both officials proceeded to Rome, where extensive discussions were held.

E. Complainant then expressed dissatisfaction with the manner in which the management of the Jordan forestry project and his charges against the project manager were being investigated. On 1 February 1965, complainant wrote to the chief of the headquarters technical unit supervising the project that discussions had not been pursued and that he was proposing to fly back to Amman the following day. On the same day, complainant was notified in writing that he should remain in Rome until further notice and " occupy himself " with assignments to be given to him in that technical unit. The note added that, as complainant had been warned to wind up his affairs in December and had had over a month in Amman to do so, he should have been prepared to remain in Rome. The question of his return to Jordan would be considered once a definite decision had been made concerning his future assignment.

F. On 2 February 1965 complainant saw a cable from the Resident Representative in Amman indicating that Mrs. Saini was unwilling to travel without her husband's authority, and complainant immediately protested, in writing, against this unwarranted interference in his personal affairs. Although it is established that F.A.O. cabled the Resident Representative not to interfere with Mrs. Saini's arrangements, the protest was left unanswered. On 7 February 1965 complainant received a letter from his wife saying she had been visited by the Deputy Resident Representative, who had urged her to fly to Rome, and complainant immediately proceeded to Amman, leaving behind him a note in which, after recalling his grievances, he claimed that the discussions so far held had been fruitless, that he was being detained in Rome while he and now his wife were being subjected to pressure, that he had come to Rome for discussions rather than for the purpose of reassignment, as envisaged in December 1964, and that, as a matter of moral duty, he was returning to Amman.

G. On 9 February 1965 the Resident Representative in Amman cabled F.A.O., mentioning the return of Mr. Saini and requesting instructions. On 11 February, acting on instructions from F.A.O., the Resident Representative notified complainant that he had left Rome against orders, that he was directed to return immediately to Rome for further discussions, and that any refusal or delay in returning would constitute a serious breach of discipline. On 13 February 1965 complainant cabled that the work he had been detained in Rome to perform was neither part of his present contract nor of his terms of reference and therefore constituted a breach of contract by F.A.O., that his return to the duty station provided for in his appointment was no breach of discipline, and that any orders contrary to contractual clauses were in breach of contract. He added that he had already agreed to be reassigned, and was awaiting at his current duty station further details concerning his new assignment. On 19 February 1965 complainant was notified that the Director-General had decided to terminate his services with the Organisation as of 28 February 1965 in the interests of the Organisation in accordance with Manual section 370.831, clause (vi), and was informed of the financial and administrative arrangements consequent upon this decision.

H. When complainant was informed of the sums to be paid to him upon termination of his appointment, he pointed out that his salary, as calculated, did not include the annual increment which would have been payable in respect of the year 1964 and, in reply to his inquiry, was advised, on 17 March 1965, that having regard to his conduct and to the events which led to the termination of his appointment no increment could be awarded. Complainant protested and, on 23 April 1965, appealed against the decision to withhold his increment.

I. Following internal appeals and the final confirmation of the decision to terminate his appointment, complainant instituted proceedings before the Tribunal and claims—(a) that he was denied access to documents essential to the presentation of his case and, in particular, to the full text of the report of the F.A.O. Internal Appeals Committee, that the provisions of the Manual on which F.A.O. relied to refuse access to these documents should be quashed, and that the Tribunal should order the relevant documents to be produced; (b) that the decision to terminate his appointment in the interests of the Organisation be quashed, and that he be reinstated and paid compensation and costs or an indemnity for failure to reinstate him; and (c) that the annual salary increment in respect of the year 1964 was unlawfully withheld and should be restored. The Organisation prays for the dismissal of the complaint under each of these three heads.

Considerations

On the termination of complainant's appointment:

1. Staff Regulation 301.136 empowers the Director-General to determine the salary rates and the terms and conditions of employment applicable to field project personnel. Having regard to the generality of its terms, this provision must be regarded as applicable to such field project officers who hold fixed-term appointments as well as to those who hold other types of appointments. The Director-General exercised the power thus conferred upon him in promulgating section 370 of the F.A.O. Manual. Complainant's contract provided that he was appointed as a field project officer. Consequently, the Director-General correctly considered that the provisions of Manual section 370 and, more particularly, section 370.831 were applicable and relied on them to terminate complainant's appointment. Section 370.831 provides that experts may be terminated " (i) for abolition of post, no appropriate reassignment being available in the programme; (ii) if for reasons of health he is incapacitated for further service; (iii) if his services prove unsatisfactory; (iv) for misconduct; (v) for reason of unsuitability for a post or assignment, no appropriate reassignment being available in the programme (acceptability to a government is a condition of suitability); and (vi) if, in the opinion of the Director-General, termination would be in the interests of the Organisation ". Complainant submits that the Organisation by relying on clause (vi) of the above provision invoked the interests of the Organisation in order to effect the termination of his appointment for disciplinary reasons without making and proving a charge and without following the procedure applicable to such cases; whereas the Organisation pleads that it could legitimately invoke the interests of the Organisation to terminate complainant's appointment notwithstanding that it could also have invoked one or more of the other causes set forth in section 370.831.

2. It follows that the question before the Tribunal is what is the extent of the power given to the Director-General by clause (vi) of Manual section 370.831. If the power is read by itself, it is apparently absolute. But it must be considered together with the other provisions of the section. If clause (vi) is read as granting an absolute power, all the other provisions in the section are superfluous, since in each of the five preceding cases it would inevitably be in the interests of the Organisation to terminate the appointment. Moreover, if the power is absolute, it could be used to substitute the test of the Director-General's opinion for the test of fact; the Organisation would not have to prove, for example, that misconduct had been committed but only that the Director-General believed that it had.

3. For these reasons, the power in clause (vi) cannot be read as an absolute power exercisable in all cases, but must be read subject to a condition limiting the type of case in which it can be exercised. The condition must be framed in the light of the fact that the power will normally be used in the case of a satisfactory officer, since an unsatisfactory officer can normally be dealt with under the preceding provisions of the section. Extraordinary circumstances may arise in which the interests of the Organisation are threatened by the retention of even a valued servant, and in such a case the Director-General must have the right to terminate. This in the opinion of the Tribunal is, having regard to the context of clause (vi), the scope of the power.

4. It is for the Organisation to satisfy the Tribunal that such extraordinary circumstances exist. If the Organisation satisfies the Tribunal of this, the power arises. It is then for the Director-General to decide whether in these circumstances the interests of the Organisation require the termination of the officer's appointment, and the Tribunal will not interfere with that decision unless, on the one hand, it may have been taken by a person without authority, or in an irregular form, or there has been a failure to comply with recognised procedure, or, on the other hand, it is tainted by an error of law or based upon materially incorrect facts, or essential material elements have been left out of account or obviously wrong conclusions have been drawn from the evidence in the dossier.

5. In the present case the Organisation has failed to satisfy the Tribunal that any extraordinary circumstances existed. The facts which are relied on as justifying the termination are the inability of the complainant to get on with his superiors and colleagues and in February 1965 his refusal to obey lawful orders. These facts, if proved, might justify action under clause (iv) or (v) of the section, but not under clause (vi). Accordingly, the Tribunal concludes that the Director-General had no power to terminate the complainant's appointment under clause (vi) and finds that, on this count, the complaint is well founded, and that it is therefore unnecessary to the disposition of the case to consider the question of access to documents.

6. Article VIII of the Statute of the Tribunal provides that if the Tribunal is satisfied that the complaint was well founded it shall order the rescinding of the decision impugned or the performance of the obligation relied on. If such rescinding or execution is not possible or advisable, the Tribunal shall award the complainant compensation for the injury caused to him. Having regard to the circumstances of the case, the Tribunal considers the rescinding of the decision impugned to be inadvisable and considers that complainant should be awarded compensation for the injury he has suffered. After an appraisal of all the circumstances of the case, and having regard to the attitude of the Organisation towards complainant prior to ordering his return to Rome and chiefly to the attitude of complainant after being directed to return to Rome, the Tribunal considers that the proper amount to award Mr. Saini as compensation is one thousand United States dollars.

On the withholding of increment:

7. The Organisation contends in the first place that the claim is time-barred inasmuch as the complainant was informed by the letter of 17 March 1965 that no increment was to be granted and his appeal was not lodged until 23 April 1965. According to Staff Rule 303.131, such appeals must be lodged within two weeks after the notification of the decision impugned. The complainant asserts that the letter of 17 March 1965 was a reply to an inquiry, and that the decision not to grant an increment was not notified before 13 April, so that his appeal of 23 April was lodged within the prescribed two-week time limit. In the opinion of the Tribunal the terms of the letter of 17 March 1965, even if constituting an explanation rather than a notification, were unambiguous; the complainant was thereby put on notice that the increment was not being granted and put in a position to lodge an appeal. Consequently, his appeal of 23 April is, as the Organisation submits, time-barred and cannot be considered. It follows that his claim under this head must fail.

On costs:

8. As complainant was represented by counsel and as the Tribunal made no order to hear him personally, F.A.O. was not required to defray his costs of travel. The Tribunal notes that F.A.O. voluntarily paid one-half of complainant's air fare and makes no further award in this respect.

9. As the complaint has partly succeeded, an appropriate proportion of the costs incurred in connection with it should be awarded against the Organisation.

DECISION

For the above reasons,

1. The complaint for wrongful dismissal is well founded.

2. The rescinding of the decision impugned being inadvisable, compensation in the amount of one thousand United States dollars is awarded to Mr. Saini against the Food and Agriculture Organisation of the United Nations for the injury caused to him.

3. The costs incurred by the complainant in connection with the present complaint are awarded against the Organisation in the amount and in the proportion to be determined by order of the President of the Tribunal.

4. The remainder of the prayer for relief is dismissed.

(Execution of Judgment No. 90)

Judgment No. 94

The Administrative Tribunal,

Considering the application of the Food and Agriculture Organisation of the United Nations of 21 December 1965, the submissions of Mr. Ram Prasad of 4 March 1966, and the Organisation's further observations of 7 April 1966;

Considering this Tribunal's Judgment No. 90 [1] of 6 November 1965;

[1] See Official Bulletin, Vol. XLIX, No. 1, Jan. 1966, pp. 166-168.

Considering article VI, paragraph 1, second clause, and article VIII of the Statute of the Tribunal;

Having examined the documents in the dossier, oral proceedings having neither been requested by the parties nor ordered by the Tribunal;

Considering that the material facts of the case are as follows:

A. By Judgment No. 90, of 6 November 1965, the Administrative Tribunal quashed the decision of the Director-General of the Food and Agriculture Organisation of the United Nations to terminate the appointment of Mr. Prasad for unsatisfactory services.

B. On 21 December 1965 the Food and Agriculture Organisation made an application to the Tribunal in which it was submitted that, as no oral proceedings were to be held in the original case, and as the Organisation therefore had had no opportunity to make oral submission concerning the possibility or advisability of reinstating the complainant, should the Tribunal find for him, the Organisation assumed that the Tribunal would, ex officio, make provision, in its judgment, for alternative relief by way of indemnity, should the Organisation find it impossible to give full effect to Judgment No. 90 by reinstating the complainant, and therefore made no submissions in this connection. However, after a full review of the position following Judgment No. 90, the Organisation found that, having regard to the fact, further particularised in the observations of 7 April 1966, that there no longer existed, within the limited establishment of its New Delhi Sub-Regional Office, any vacant post in the grade formerly held by complainant, it was impossible to reinstate Mr. Prasad. Accordingly, the Organisation prayed the Tribunal, by reference to article VIII of its Statute, to decide that, in lieu of reinstatement, Mr. Prasad should be awarded compensation for the prejudice suffered as a result of the Organisation's decision to terminate his appointment, and submitted particulars concerning Mr. Prasad's salary and allowances while in the service of F.A.O.

C. When the application of F.A.O. was communicated to him for observations, Mr. Prasad submitted that, in his complaint, he had prayed for the quashing of the decision complained of, and for reinstatement; that the Organisation was bound to take into account this prayer for relief; and that it was its responsibility to request the Tribunal, before judgment was given, to take into consideration the fact that no vacancy existed and to rely on article VIII of the Statute of the Tribunal to request that, in case the complaint were held to be well founded, alternative relief be granted by way of indemnity. In conclusion, Mr. Prasad submitted that the Organisation's application was in violation of article VI of the Statute of the Tribunal and that the Tribunal should dismiss it and order F.A.O. to honour Judgment No. 90.

CONSIDERATIONS

1. Under article VIII of the Statute of the Tribunal " In cases falling under article II, the Tribunal, if satisfied that the complaint was well founded, shall order the rescinding of the decision impugned or the performance of the obligation relied upon. If such rescinding of a decision or execution of an obligation is not possible or advisable, the Tribunal shall award the complainant compensation for the injury caused to him."

2. It follows from this provision that where the Tribunal is satisfied that a complaint by an official praying for the quashing of an administrative decision is well founded, the Tribunal can either quash the decision or, if it considers that the reinstatement of the official concerned, which is the necessary consequence of the quashing of the decision, is not possible or advisable, award compensation, the choice between these alternatives being made either in the light of written or oral observations of the parties or of its own motion.

3. By Judgment No. 90 of 6 November 1965 the Tribunal quashed the decision of 18 March 1965 dismissing Mr. Prasad, thereby finding that his reinstatement was possible and not inadvisable; this judgment, which disposes of the issues raised, is final, and the Organisation cannot reopen these issues.

4. Moreover, Mr. Prasad's reinstatement was possible at the date on which the judgment was given, since, according to the Organisation's own admission, the period of appointment of his successor would expire on 31 December 1965, and it will again become possible on 31 December 1966 upon the expiry of that successor's new period of appointment, execution of the judgment being a valid reason for non-renewal of his appointment. On the other hand, having regard to the nature of the employment in question, the Organisation was not obliged, in any event, to reinstate the complainant in the identical post he had occupied, but might have offered him any other substantially equivalent post; in particular, the fact that the G.2 level post held by Mr. Prasad had been converted in the interests of the service to a G.1 post would not have prevented an offer of this post to Mr. Prasad, the Organisation being entitled, in the event of his refusing it, to draw the appropriate conclusions.

5. Consequently, the Organisation must comply with the judgment given and pronounce the reinstatement of Mr. Prasad as from the date at which his employment was illegally terminated, and this implies that, in addition to the payment of arrears of salary, the Organisation must offer him either the same post or one substantially equivalent.

DECISION

For the above reasons,

The application of the Food and Agriculture Organisation of the United Nations is dismissed.

In witness of this judgment, delivered in public sitting in Geneva on 11 October 1966 by Mr. Maxime Letourneur, President, Mr. André Grisel, Vice-President, and the Right Honourable Lord Devlin, P.C., Judge, the aforementioned have hereunto attached their signatures to these presents, as well as myself, Lemoine, Registrar of the Tribunal.

Text of the Judgment Given in the Case of: L'Evêque against International Telecommunication Union

INTERNATIONAL LABOUR ORGANISATION

ADMINISTRATIVE TRIBUNAL

Sixteenth Ordinary Session (Geneva, 1-11 October 1966)

Registry's translation, the French text alone being authoritative.

In re L'Evêque Judgment No. 95

The Administrative Tribunal,

Considering the complaint against the International Telecommunication Union drawn up by Mr. Charles L'Evêque on 7 March 1963, brought into conformity with the Rules of Court on 8 April 1963;

Considering order No. 76[1], dated 11 September 1964, by which the Tribunal, before giving judgment—(1) ordered the hearing as witnesses of Messrs. Robert Ward, Georges Chamot, Jean-Pierre Christinat, Alf. S. Winter-Jensen and Jean-Paul Bernard; (2) decided that Mr. Ward should reply, in accordance with the conditions laid down in paragraph 3 of article 14 of the Rules of Court, to the questions drawn up by the Tribunal on the proposals of the parties; (3) decided that the other witnesses proposed by the complainant should be examined by the Tribunal at a hearing on a date to be fixed subsequently; (4) authorised I.T.U. to request the hearing of witnesses in a position to testify as to the facts of the case;

(5) instructed the Registrar of the Tribunal to take all the measures necessary to give effect to the present decision;

Considering the documents in the dossier relating to supplementary measures of investigation, and specifically the order of 25 October 1965 concerning the hearing as witness of Mr. Ward in the United States and the reference to the State Department of the United States of questions raised by the I.T.U. in regard to any diplomatic immunity that might apply to Mr. Ward, as well as the order of 18 May 1966 calling, at the request of the President of the Bar Association of South Carolina, commissioned by the Tribunal to interrogate Mr. Ward, for the production of a document in I.T.U.'s possession, together with I.T.U.'s memorandum of 26 July 1966 explaining the reasons invoked against producing this document;

Considering the Statute and Rules of Court of the Administrative Tribunal;

A. Considering that the complainant requested the quashing of a decision of 7 August 1962 by which the Secretary-General of I.T.U. terminated his appointment during his probationary period, on the ground that the decision impugned was taken for reasons extraneous to the interests of the service, and, in particular, to the complainant's professional qualifications, and consequently asked that compensation be granted to him in an amount equal to the salary and allowances which would have been paid to him up to the end of his probationary period, together with the costs incurred in connection with the present complaint;

B. Considering that I.T.U. prays for the dismissal of the complaint, asserting that the decision impugned was taken in application of article 9.1, paragraph (a) (3), of the Staff Regulations which provides that a probationary official's appointment may be terminated at any time if, in the opinion of the Secretary-General, this is in the interests of the Union, and that this measure was taken exclusively on account of the professional incompetence of the complainant;

C. Considering that, as noted in order No. 76 referred to above, the parties being opposed with regard to the facts, the Tribunal has carried out a full investigation of the case, both ex officio and at the request of the parties;

D. Considering that, by an instrument filed with the Registrar on 7 September 1966, the complainant, having regard to the fact that he had accepted I.T.U.'s offer to settle the case out of court by paying the whole amount of the compensation claimed, namely the sum of 14,930.50 Swiss francs, which had been deposited with his counsel, together with such legal costs and fees as the Tribunal might order, declares that he has withdrawn any claim whatsoever with respect to the relief prayed for in his complaint.

DECISION

1. Mr. L'Evêque's withdrawal of suit is hereby recorded.

2. The amount of the costs and fees of the complainant's legal counsel to be borne by I.T.U. is fixed at 5,300 Swiss francs.

In witness of this judgment, delivered in public sitting in Geneva on 11 October 1966 by Mr. Maxime Letourneur, President, Mr. André Grisel, Vice-President, and the Right Honourable Lord Devlin, P.C., Judge, the aforementioned have hereunto attached their signatures to these presents, as well as myself, Lemoine, Registrar of the Tribunal.

Text of the Judgment Given in the Case of: Jurado against International Labour Organisation

INTERNATIONAL LABOUR ORGANISATION

ADMINISTRATIVE TRIBUNAL

Sixteenth Ordinary Session (Geneva, 1-11 October 1966)

Registry's translation, the French text alone being authoritative.

In re Jurado — Judgment No. 96

(No. 17—Termination of Appointment)

The Administrative Tribunal,

Considering the complaint against the International Labour Organisation drawn up by Mr. Cesáreo Jurado, on 10 August 1966, in which he prays—(1) for the quashing of the decision of the Director-General of the I.L.O. on 29 July 1966 to terminate his services on 31 August 1966 or to pay him an indemnity equal to three months' salary; (2) for the President of the Tribunal to order various preliminary measures; (3) that Judges Letourneur, Grisel and Armbruster should not try the case; and (4) for the award of compensation under nine different heads;

Considering the reply of the Organisation of 9 September 1966 which submits that the complaint should be dismissed;

Considering articles VI, VII and VIII of the Statute of the Tribunal and articles 1.1 to 1.7 and 12.8 of the Staff Regulations of the International Labour Office;

Having examined the documents in the dossier, whereupon the oral proceedings requested by the complainant were found to be unnecessary to the disposition of the case and were disallowed;

CONSIDERATIONS

On the objection to the composition of the Tribunal:

1. Neither the fact that two of the judges who sat in the case previously brought by Mr. Jurado before the Tribunal, which gave rise to Judgment No. 70 [1] delivered by that Tribunal on 11 September 1964, have been called upon to hear a further case brought by the same complainant nor the fact that one of these judges is of Swiss nationality or sits on the Supreme Court of that country can be regarded by itself as a valid ground for objection to these judges.

On the request for preliminary measures:

2. Mr. Jurado, complaining of the duress and intimidation with which he is faced and may continue to be faced on the part of the I.L.O., prays the President of the Tribunal to take all necessary measures to guarantee his complete independence and the free exercise of his rights. The fact that the proceedings are being conducted by the Tribunal itself affords the complainant every necessary guarantee; moreover, the Tribunal finds no evidence whatsoever of duress or intimidation on the part of the I.L.O.

3. Complainant's submission that the President of the Tribunal should make an order to authorise him to communicate the dossier of the case to the Spanish Government does not fall within the competence of either the President or the Tribunal. Finally, Mr. Jurado asks the President of the Tribunal to order the International Labour Office to acknowledge as its own the document attached to the letter of the Director-General of 25 July 1966, but the Organisation in its reply fully acknowledges the said document.

On the decision complained of:

4. While complainants have an absolute right to apply to the Administrative Tribunal, within the jurisdiction assigned to it, without any restriction and are allowed great freedom in supporting their claims, both in form and in substance, this right and this freedom are granted to ensure respect for their terms of appointment.

5. By his repeated complaints against decisions which, in general, did not affect his rights as an official, by reverting on several occasions to allegations which the Tribunal had already dismissed, by applying to the Tribunal for the purpose of lending force to the wild and unnecessarily wounding allegations which he has repeatedly made against the Organisation and the Swiss authorities, Mr. Jurado has entirely perverted from its proper purpose the right of appeal to the Administrative Tribunal afforded to I.L.O. officials and has affronted the dignity of his Organisation and of the Tribunal.

6. In these circumstances the complainant's behaviour, in which he persisted over a period of several years in spite of warnings from the Organisation and from the Tribunal, showed repeated infringements by him, in particular of article 1.1, 1.2 and 1.7 of the Staff Regulations, and was of a nature to throw public discredit on the Organisation; it thus constituted serious misconduct which under article 12.8 of the Staff Regulations was such as legally to justify his summary dismissal without notice.

7. If the procedure laid down by the above-mentioned article was not followed, this was at the formal request of the complainant who in a letter dated 28 July 1966 stated his express desire to be able to file a complaint directly with the Tribunal against any decision that might be taken to terminate his appointment.

8. Even assuming that the conditions specified in article 12.8 referred to above were not fulfilled and that no other basis could be found for the decision impugned, there could be no question of quashing that decision, but only of awarding Mr. Jurado compensation which, in the circumstances of the case, could not exceed the amount which the Organisation has seen fit to award him ex gratia.

On the award of compensation (heads (a) to (c), (f) and (i)):

9. The submissions under these heads must be dismissed as a consequence of the dismissal of the submissions regarding the decision complained of.

On the award of compensation (head (d)):

10. Whereas Mr. Jurado claims an indemnity of 50,000 Swiss francs for the prejudice caused to his health, the attitude of the I.L.O., which remained not only impeccable throughout, but was also benevolent, cannot in any way be regarded as being such as to affect adversely the health of the complainant.

On the award of compensation (heads (e) and (g)):

11. The assertions relied upon for the claims under these two heads are manifestly erroneous in fact and misconceived in law, and the above claims must be set aside.

On the award of compensation (head (h)):

12. These submissions must be dismissed as unfounded partly because no compensation can be granted to a complainant for the work he carried out personally for the purpose of defending his own interests and also because dismissal of the submissions under the other heads involves the dismissal of any claim for reimbursement of expenses actually incurred in the preparation of the complaint.

On the submissions concerning the award of a certificate of service:

13. Complainant does not adduce any evidence whatsoever of the existence of any decision of the Organisation to refuse a certificate of service. The submissions under this head are therefore not receivable.

DECISION

For the above reasons,

The complaint is dismissed.

In witness of this judgment, delivered in public sitting in Geneva on 11 October 1966 by Mr. Maxime Letourneur, President, Mr. André Grisel, Vice-President, and the Right Honourable Lord Devlin, P.C., Judge, the aforementioned have hereunto subscribed their signatures, as well as myself, Lemoine, Registrar of the Tribunal.

2. In accordance with the procedure laid down in paragraph 12 of its 29th Report, as amended by paragraph 5 of its 43rd Report, the Committee recommends the Governing Body to examine the present report at its 163rd Session.[1]

3. The Committee considered—(a) 57 cases in which the complaints had been communicated to the governments concerned for their observations, namely the cases relating to Sudan (Case No. 191), Singapore (Case No. 194), Thailand (Case No. 202), United Kingdom (Southern Rhodesia) (Cases Nos. 251 and 414), Portugal (Case No. 266), Chile (Case No. 271), Libya (Case No. 274), Belgium (Case No. 281), Burundi (Cases Nos. 282 and 401), Cuba (Cases Nos. 283, 329 and 425), United Kingdom (Aden) (Case No. 291), United Kingdom (Case No. 292), Spain (Cases Nos. 294, 383, 397 and 400), Republic of South Africa (Cases Nos. 300, 311 and 321), Ghana (Case No. 303), Greece (Case No. 309), Peru (Case No. 335), Greece (Case No. 341), Panama (Case No. 349), Dominican Republic (Case No. 350), Greece (Case No. 353), Mexico (Case No. 358), Dominican Republic (Case No. 360), Colombia (Case No. 363), Congo (Leopoldville) (Case No. 365), Portugal (Case No. 370), Federal Republic of Germany (Case No. 371), Haiti (Case No. 373), Honduras (Case No. 381), Brazil (Case No. 385), Guatemala (Case No. 396), Argentina (Case No. 399), Upper Volta (Case No. 403), United Kingdom (British Guiana) (Case No. 406), Dominican Republic (Case No. 411), United Kingdom (St. Vincent) (Case No. 415), Cameroon (Case No. 418), Congo (Brazzaville) (Case No. 419), United Kingdom (Aden) (Case No. 421), Ecuador (Case No. 422), Honduras (Case No. 423), Portugal (Case No. 432), Ecuador (Case No. 433), Paraguay (Case No. 441), Guatemala (Case No. 442), Colombia (Case No. 452), Greece (Case No. 453) and Bolivia (Case No. 456); and (b) one complaint relating to Bolivia (Case No. 443), nine relating to the Dominican Republic (Case No. 447) and one relating to El Salvador (Case No. 450), and also seven further complaints relating to Brazil (Case No. 385) and nine relating to Paraguay (Case No. 441), which were submitted to the Committee for opinion prior to being communicated to the governments concerned.

Cases the Examination of Which the Committee Has Adjourned

(a) Case Which the Committee Considers to Be Urgent.

4. The Committee adjourned until its next session its examination of the case relating to Cameroon (Case No. 418), in which further information previously requested from the government concerned was received only after the close of the session of the Committee, and in which further allegations have been submitted by the complainants.

(b) Other Cases.

5. The Committee adjourned until its next session the cases relating to Thailand (Case No. 202), Portugal (Case No. 266), Cuba (Cases Nos. 283, 329 and 425), United Kingdom (Case No. 292), Greece (Case No. 309), Panama (Case No. 349), Dominican Republic (Case No. 350), Greece (Case No. 353), Dominican Republic (Case No. 360), Colombia (Case No. 363), Federal Republic of Germany (Case No. 371), Honduras (Case No. 381), Guatemala (Case No. 396), Upper Volta (Case No. 403) and Honduras (Case No. 423), on which it is still awaiting further information previously requested from the governments concerned, and the cases relating to Mexico (Case No. 358), Portugal (Case No. 432) and Ecuador (Case No. 433), with respect to which the Committee has asked the Director-General to obtain further information from the governments concerned before it formulates its recommendations to the Governing Body. With regard to the case relating to Guatemala (Case No. 396), the Committee took note of a communication from the government concerned stating that the information requested would be furnished when it became available; with regard to the case relating to Panama (Case No. 349), the Committee took note of a communication from the government concerned stating that it was awaiting information from the competent authorities; with regard to the cases relating to Colombia (Case No. 363) and the Federal Republic of Germany (Case No. 371), the Committee took note of communications from the governments concerned stating that the matter was under consideration.

6. The Committee adjourned until its next session the case relating to Bolivia (Case No. 456), in which it has not yet received the observations of the government concerned, and the cases relating to Colombia (Case No. 452) and Greece (Case No. 453), in which it is awaiting the observations of the governments concerned on further complaints or information submitted by the complainants.

7. The Committee also adjourned until its next session the cases relating to Singapore (Case No. 194), United Kingdom (Southern Rhodesia) (Cases Nos. 251 and 414), Belgium (Case No. 281), Ghana (Case No. 303) and Haiti (Case No. 373).

Cases in Which the Committee Submits Its Conclusions to the Governing Body

8. In the present report the Committee submits for the approval of the Governing Body the conclusions which it has now reached concerning the remaining cases before it, namely the cases relating to Sudan (Case No. 191), Chile (Case No. 271), Libya (Case No. 274), Burundi (Cases Nos. 282 and 401), United Kingdom (Aden) (Case No. 291), Spain (Cases Nos. 294, 383, 397 and 400), Republic of South Africa (Cases Nos. 300, 311 and 321), Peru (Case No. 335), Greece (Case No. 341), Congo (Leopoldville) (Case No. 365), Portugal (Case No. 370), Brazil (Case No. 385), Argentina (Case No. 399), United Kingdom (British Guiana) (Case No. 406), Dominican Republic (Case No. 411), United Kingdom (St. Vincent) (Case No. 415), Congo (Brazzaville) (Case No. 419), United Kingdom (Aden) (Case No. 421), Ecuador (Case No. 422), Paraguay (Case No. 441), Guatemala (Case No. 442), the complaints relating to Bolivia (Case No. 443), Dominican Republic (Case No. 447) and El Salvador (Case No. 450) and the further complaints relating to Brazil (Case No. 385) and Paraguay (Case No. 441), which were submitted to the Committee for opinion. These conclusions may be briefly summarised as follows:

(a) the Committee recommends that the complaints relating to Bolivia (Case No. 443), Dominican Republic (Case No. 447) and El Salvador (Case No. 450), and the further complaints relating to Brazil (Case No. 385) and Paraguay (Case No. 441), which were submitted to it for opinion, should, for the reasons indicated in paragraphs 9 to 14 of this report, be dismissed as irreceivable under the procedure in force, without being communicated to the governments concerned;

(b) the Committee recommends that, for the reasons indicated in paragraphs 15 to 58 of this report, the cases relating to Chile (Case No. 271), Portugal (Case No. 370) and Paraguay (Case No. 441) should be dismissed as not calling for further examination;

(c) with regard to the cases relating to the Republic of South Africa (Cases Nos. 300, 311 and 321), Greece (Case No. 341), United Kingdom (British Guiana) (Case No. 406), Dominican Republic (Case No. 411) and United Kingdom (St. Vincent) (Case No. 415), the Committee, for the reasons indicated in paragraphs 59 to 246 of this report, has reached certain conclusions to which it wishes to draw the attention of the Governing Body;

(d) with regard to the cases relating to Sudan (Case No. 191), Libya (Case No. 274), Burundi (Cases Nos. 282 and 401), United Kingdom (Aden) (Case No. 291), Spain (Cases Nos. 294, 383, 397 and 400), Peru (Case No. 335), Congo (Leopoldville) (Case No. 365), Brazil (Case No. 385), Argentina (Case No. 399), Congo (Brazzaville) (Case No. 419), United Kingdom (Aden) (Case No. 421), Ecuador (Case No. 422) and Guatemala (Case No. 442), the Committee, for the reasons indicated in paragraphs 247 to 552 of this report, has presented an interim report stating certain conclusions to which it wishes to draw the attention of the Governing Body.

COMPLAINTS WHICH THE COMMITTEE RECOMMENDS SHOULD BE DISMISSED AS IRRECEIVABLE UNDER THE PROCEDURE IN FORCE

9. The Director-General has received, either directly or through the United Nations, a number of complaints which are not receivable by virtue of various provisions in the existing procedure.

10. The complaints in question are irreceivable for one or other of three reasons: (a) three because they emanate not from workers' or employers' organisations [1] but, as regards one of them, from an individual, as regards the second, from a non-occupational association, and, as regards the third, from a political party which exists, moreover, in a country different from that referred to in the complaint; (b) one because it emanates from an international organisation of workers not having consultative status with the I.L.O. and not having affiliates in the country concerned [2]; (c) 23 because they emanate from national organisations of workers in countries other than those to which the complaints relate, having no direct interest in the matters raised in the allegations.[3]

11. So far as the first of these three categories is concerned, the Director-General has received a communication dated 17 May 1965 from Dr. Aníbal Aguilar Peñarrieta, former Minister of Labour of Bolivia now in exile in Peru, who, in his own name, formulates allegations of infringements of trade union rights in Bolivia (Case No. 443); a communication dated 18 July 1965, from the "Eudianum" Library and Centre for Philosophical Studies (Bolivia), containing allegations of infringements of trade union rights in the Dominican Republic (Case No. 447); and a communication dated 18 October 1965 from the Christian Democratic Party of El Salvador containing allegations of infringements of trade union rights in Brazil (Case No. 385).

12. So far as the second category is concerned, the Director-General has received a communication dated 8 September 1965 emanating from the Trade Union International of Metallurgical and Mechanical Workers' Unions and containing allegations of infringements of trade union rights in Brazil (Case No. 385).

13. With regard to complaints falling within the third category, the Director-General has received—

(a) five communications containing allegations of infringements of trade union rights in Brazil (Case No. 385) forwarded by the following organisations on the dates indicated: Puerto Rican Federation of Democratic Trade Unions (28 September 1965), Bolivian Trade Union Action (28 September 1965), Uruguayan Trade Union Action (29 September 1965), Autonomous Trade Union Movement of Nicaragua (1 October 1965) and Union of Workers in the Dyeing Industry (Mexico) (21 October 1965);

(b) nine communications containing allegations of infringements of trade union rights in Paraguay (Case No. 441) forwarded by the following organisations on the dates indicated: Bolivian Trade Union Action (17 May 1965), Trade Union Action of Antioquia (Colombia) (19 May 1965), Unitary Workers' Movement of Chile (19 May 1965), National Union of Christian Workers of El Salvador (19 May 1965), Federation of Christian Workers of the Isthmus (Panama) (19 May 1965), Federation of Christian Workers and Peasants of Costa Rica (19 May 1965), Central Federation of Workers of Guatemala (22 May 1965), Authentic Labour Front (Mexico) (24 May 1965) and the Guiana Confederation of Workers and Peasants (27 May 1965);

[1] See First Report, para. 14.

[2] See 29th Report, para. 9.

(c) eight communications containing allegations of infringements of trade union rights in the Dominican Republic (Case No. 447) forwarded by the following organisations on the dates indicated: Revolutionary Transport Organisation (Cuban organisation in exile in the United States) (9 July 1965), Federation of Christian Workers and Peasants of Costa Rica (10 July 1965), Social Federation of Christian Peasants of Guatemala (12 July 1965), Trade Union Action of Antioquia (Colombia) (13 July 1965), Uruguayan Trade Union Action (14 July 1965), Christian Confederation of Workers (Paraguay) (22 July 1965), Christian Trade Union Movement of Peru (23 July 1965) and Christian Federation of Peasants of El Salvador (28 July 1965);

(d) a communication containing allegations of infringements of trade union rights in El Salvador (Case No. 450) forwarded by the Federation of Peasants of Guatemala on 23 July 1965.

14. The Committee recommends the Governing Body to decide that, for the reasons indicated in paragraph 10 above, the complaints referred to in paragraphs 11 to 13 above are not receivable under the procedure in force.

Cases Which the Committee Considers Do Not Call for Further Examination

Case No. 271:

Complaints Presented by the Chilean Confederation of Industrial and Commercial Workers and the Chilean Confederation of Privately Employed Clerical Workers against the Government of Chile

15. The Committee has already made several interim reports to the Governing Body on this case.[1] At the May (1965) Session it submitted the following recommendation in paragraph 124 of its 83rd Report:

> The Committee notes with interest the communication received from the Government, which quotes the operative part of the Supreme Court's judgment. Nevertheless, in view of the fact that the Court also refers to the judgments of first and second instance, which appear to have contained a detailed analysis of the reasons for the measures taken against Mr. Sánchez Ossandón in the light of de facto and de jure aspects of the case, the Committee recommends the Governing Body, in order to secure all the material needed to come to a conclusion on this case, to request the Government to be good enough to forward copies of these judgments and their grounds.

16. The 83rd Report was approved by the Governing Body at its 162nd Session (May-June 1965) and the request contained in paragraph 124 thereof was communicated to the Government by letter dated 8 June 1965.

17. The original complaint figures in a communication dated 25 August 1961 which was sent to the I.L.O. by the Chilean Confederation of Industrial and Commercial Workers. The same organisation gave supplementary information in a letter of 20 October 1961. The Confederation of Privately Employed Clerical Workers submitted a complaint to the same effect in a letter dated 4 October 1961. The above communications, and further information provided by the Chilean Confederation of Industrial and Commercial Workers in a letter of 31 January 1962, were transmitted to the Government in due course.

18. The Government of Chile sent its first reply on 20 November 1961.

19. Chile has not ratified the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), or the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98).

Allegations relating to the Dismissal of a Trade Union Officer

20. The complainants alleged that Mr. Enrique Sánchez Ossandón, President of the Chilean Confederation of Industrial and Commercial Workers and a member of the Central Mixed Wages Commission, who was employed by Madeco S.A. (a copper-manufacturing company), was dismissed from that undertaking for having come to Geneva to attend the 45th Session of the International Labour Conference, as Chilean Workers' adviser, in June 1961. They stated further that Mr. Sánchez Ossandón was appointed as adviser under Decree No. 412 of 2 June 1961; that on the same day he informed Madeco of his appointment, sent a copy of the communication to the Labour Inspectorate and asked the Ministry of Labour to notify Madeco of the appointment, which was done by official letter on 5 June; that Madeco, in reply to the Ministry's letter, said the company reserved all its rights in regard to the situation which Mr. Sánchez Ossandón had created by absenting himself from work without his employer's permission. The complainants attached copies of various documents in support of their complaint and added that when Mr. Sánchez Ossandón returned to Chile and reported to the Madeco Company to resume his duties, he was not allowed to enter and was informed that his services were terminated; he reported this to the Labour Inspectorate on 2 August and, at the same time, lodged a request with the labour court to be reinstated, since he enjoyed trade union privilege through being a member of the Central Mixed Wages Commission and Chairman of the Confederation of Metal Workers' Unions. Mr. Sánchez Ossandón brought the case to the notice of the Ministry of Labour which, according to the complainants, made representations to Madeco but could not induce it to change its attitude. The complainants alleged that the attitude of Madeco was merely a continuance of a campaign of persecution against Mr. Sánchez Ossandón on the sole ground of his trade union activity.

21. In its reply of 20 November 1961 the Government stated that as soon as the competent authorities were informed of the matter they instructed the labour services to investigate the facts and to demand compliance with the rules protecting trade union officers; that in view of the undertaking's refusal to reinstate Mr. Sánchez Ossandón the provincial labour inspectorate laid information with the labour courts for contravention of the existing rules, which forbid dismissal or suspension of trade union officers without previous judicial permission; and that in a letter to the Ministry of Labour the Managing Director of Madeco contended that Mr. Sánchez Ossandón had not been dismissed but that his employment contract had lapsed for statutory reasons, namely frequent absence from work and abandoning his post when he went to Geneva.

22. At its sessions in October 1962 and May 1963 the Committee examined the additional information which had been sent by the Government at the Committee's request. This indicated that although Madeco had eventually been fined in the proceedings taken by the labour authorities, Mr. Sánchez Ossandón had not been reinstated in his employment or received any compensation, since the proceedings to that effect which he had taken against the company before the labour courts were still pending.

23. By letter of 21 December 1963 the Government stated that the court of first instance had not granted Mr. Sánchez Ossandón's application and that he had lodged an appeal; when a final decision had been reached the Government would forward a copy. While awaiting further information the Committee decided, at its 35th, 36th, 37th, 38th and 39th Sessions, to postpone examination of the case and ask the Government to forward the necessary information as soon as possible.

24. At its 40th Session the Committee took note of a further communication from the Government, dated 17 March 1965; it reported that the decision of the court of second instance had been partly favourable to Mr. Sánchez Ossandón, but that the other party had appealed to the Supreme Court, which, in a judgment given on 3 July 1964, had confirmed all the findings of the court of first instance. Moreover, as the judgments of the courts of first and second instance—copies of which had not been sent by the Government—might contain elements of value with a view to reaching a conclusion on the case, the Committee recommended the Governing Body, in paragraph 124 of the 83rd Report, to request the Government to forward copies of those judgments and their grounds.

25. By letter dated 20 August 1965 the Government of Chile sent copies of the two judgments, issued respectively on 30 October 1963 (in first instance) and 8 May 1964 (in second instance).

26. Perusal of the judgment given in first instance, and subsequently endorsed by the Supreme Court, shows that claims by Mr. Sánchez Ossandón against Madeco accumulated during the proceedings. He first requested reinstatement in a post from which he had been transferred to another at a lower level or, failing this, that his contract be held to have been terminated and the company be ordered to pay him compensation; in that claim Mr. Sánchez Ossandón accused the company of engaging in a systematic campaign of persecution by reason of his trade union activities. In a second claim the plaintiff asked that the company be ordered to reinstate him in the post from which he had been dismissed on his return from Geneva and to pay the remuneration corresponding to the period following his dismissal or, failing this, that his contract be held to have been terminated and the company be ordered to pay him compensation.

27. In the relevant passages (grounds) of the judgment it is stated that the transfer operated by the undertaking, although it involved a lower level of responsibility, neither broke the contract of employment nor infringed Mr. Sánchez Ossandón's privilege as a trade union officer, since in the former connection the terms of the contract did not require him to be employed in the particular post for which he had been engaged, nor had his remuneration been affected by the transfer, and in the latter connection the plaintiff could continue to act as a member of the Central Mixed Wages Commission. There is no proof, the court continues, that the reduction in Mr. Sánchez Ossandón's level of responsibility was part of a systematic campaign to obstruct his work as a trade union representative. He, on his side, was repeatedly late for his work, or left early, or was absent; these were serious breaches of his contract of employment and amounted to reason for lapse of the contract under section 164, item 10, of the Labour Code. It is further stated that the plaintiff failed to attend his work, without justification, on 17 and 18 May 1961, this being a reason for lapse of the contract under item 1 of the same section. However, the court considers that the contract could not be declared terminated for the above reasons because the plaintiff resumed his work without protest on the company's part. On the other hand, in the case of the plaintiff's voyage to Geneva in order to attend the 45th Session of the I.L.O. Conference in the capacity of Workers' adviser, it is a matter of record that the said session ended on 29 June 1961 and that the plaintiff returned to work on 2 August. The plaintiff's absence from his work for the duration of the Conference—the grounds for the judgment continue—and a few days before its beginning and a few days after its close, was justified because article 40 of the Constitution of the I.L.O., of which Chile is a Member, provides that delegates to the Conference shall enjoy such privileges and immunities as are necessary for the independent exercise of their functions in connection with the Organisation. However, the court considers that a delay of 32 days in returning to work was not justified, and that it would have been proper to return by 16 July, the date at which a witness who had also attended the 45th Session of the Conference stated in evidence that he had returned. The court does not accept as valid the reasons adduced by Mr. Sánchez Ossandón to justify his late return. It further considers that the orders issued in the proceedings taken by the Provincial Labour Inspectorate because of the arbitrary dismissal of Mr. Sánchez Ossandón could not affect the present judgment, since those proceedings related only to the company's action in dismissing its employee without going through the statutory forms.

28. The operative part of the judgment rejects Mr. Sánchez Ossandón's applications and is unfavourable to the company only in that it declares the contract between the parties to be deemed terminated as at 16 July. The plaintiff is exonerated from payment of costs.

29. The Committee notes from the documents communicated by the Government that the reason for termination of the contract of employment between Mr. Sánchez Ossandón and Madeco has been found, by effective judgment of a competent court of law, to be that for which provision is made in item 1 of section 164 of the Labour Code of Chile, namely—

The following shall be deemed to be reasons for the lapse of the contract:

(1) desertion by the employee of his post for two consecutive days without due cause;

. . . . . .

30. The Committee observes that Mr. Sánchez Ossandón appears to have enjoyed the safeguards of due process of law throughout the long proceedings which closed with the Supreme Court's judgment of 3 July 1964.

31. The Committee notes further, with satisfaction, that in handing down its judgment the court had regard to the principle stated in article 40 of the Constitution of the I.L.O. respecting the privileges and immunities which should be enjoyed by delegates to the International Labour Conference. The Committee also recalls an observation which it made when examining in its 70th Report the allegations put forward in the same case by the Chilean Confederation of Industrial and Commercial Workers with regard to the non-submission of applications for membership of the Workers' delegation to the Conference through fear of reprisals by employers; the Government, it then observed, had described Mr. Sánchez Ossandón's situation as exceptional and declared that the public authorities had taken and would take all the steps in their power to safeguard the employment security of trade union officers to the degree allowed by existing legislation.

32. The Committee accordingly recommends the Governing Body to take note of the additional information provided by the Government in its letter of 20 August 1965 and to decide that the case does not call for further consideration.

Case No. 370:

Complaint Presented by the World Federation of Trade Unions against the Government of Portugal

33. The complaint of the World Federation of Trade Unions (W.F.T.U.) is contained in a communication dated 25 October 1963 addressed to the Secretary-General of the United Nations and transmitted by him to the International Labour Organisation. The Government furnished observations on the complaint by a communication dated 30 May 1964.

34. Portugal has not ratified the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), but has ratified the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98).

35. The complainants allege in general terms that the mere request for freedom of association and trade union activity are crimes punishable by law and that thousands of democrats are serving heavy sentences for strike action or crimes of opinion, over 100 of them being condemned to life imprisonment by virtue of the Security Measures Law, which enables imprisonment to be extended indefinitely, after the original sentence has been served, for three years at a time, on the mere proposal of the political police.

36. In support of these general allegations the complainants cite one specific case, that of Mr. Manuel Rodriguez da Silva, described as a " metallurgical worker and trade union leader ". He is alleged to have been arrested in 1936, interned without trial for nine years and arrested again in 1950; the complainants state that he is still in detention, after more than 23 years in prison, by virtue of the Security Measures Law, although the sentence imposed in 1950 has long been completed.

37. In its reply dated 30 May 1964 the Government denied that the mere request for trade union freedom or exercise of trade union activity was punishable, and stated that under Legislative Decree No. 39660 of 20 May 1954 all persons exercising their civic and political rights are entitled to establish associations of a non-secret character, the objectives of which do not involve any prejudice to the rights of other persons, the common weal, the interests of the community or the principles on which the moral, economic and social order of the nation are based. The Government denied that any prisoners accused of acts connected with crimes were in any penal institution. In the Government's view the allegations made allusion to persons convicted of subversion. Such persons, where supplementary imprisonment was imposed for security reasons, were released after less than three years of such imprisonment; others, said the Government, served no supplementary imprisonment, while others again were released after serving only half of the main term to which they had been sentenced.

38. The Government stated that Mr. Manuel Rodriguez da Silva was one of the only three persons among those serving terms of supplementary imprisonment for security reasons in whose cases it was considered necessary not to limit the supplementary imprisonment to three years. In his case security imprisonment began on 5 March 1958 and he was released on 8 January 1964.

39. At its meeting in November 1964 the Committee decided to request the Government to inform it, firstly, by what authority the sentence on Mr. Manuel Rodriguez da Silva had been imposed, and, secondly, what precisely were the acts with which he had been charged. The Government replied to this request by a communication dated 7 April 1965.

40. In this communication, which was examined by the Committee at its meeting in May 1965, the Government stated that Mr. Rodriguez da Silva was sentenced by the Lisbon Criminal Court, on 24 April 1951, to four years' solitary confinement, with 15 years' loss of political rights, for offences punishable under sections 169, 172 and 173 of the Penal Code, commuted on appeal, on 4 July 1951, to two years' imprisonment followed by eight years' assignment to forced residence. On 15 March 1954 the Third Criminal Court in Lisbon sentenced him to a further six months' imprisonment for offences under sections 169, 216 (5), 219 and 233 of the Penal Code, three months' remission being granted under Decree No. 40144. He completed his sentence on 4 March 1958 and then began to serve his period of assignment to forced residence until his release on 8 January 1964.

41. The Committee, as indicated in paragraph 252 of its 83rd Report, observed that under section 169 of the Penal Code the import, manufacture, possession, purchase, sale or supply, on any grounds whatsoever, or the transport, storage, use or carrying of prohibited weapons or explosive devices or materials, in an unlawful manner, or in a manner contrary to the rules laid down by the competent authorities, is deemed to be a punishable offence if those responsible intend them to be used, or are aware that they will be used, for the commission of a crime against the external or internal security of the State. Section 172 prescribes the penalties for acts preparatory to crimes against the external or internal security of the State, while section 173 deals with conspiracy or plotting with a view to the commission of such crimes. Sections 216 and 219 are concerned with the forging of documents, while section 233 prescribes penalties for the use of a false name with a view to escaping by any manner or means the lawful surveillance of the public authorities, or to causing any manner of harm to the State or to individuals.

42. While it appeared to the Committee from the tenor of the above-mentioned sections of the Penal Code that the sentences served by Mr. Rodriguez da Silva were imposed on grounds unconnected with any trade union activities in which he might have been engaged, the Committee, following its usual practice, recommended the Governing Body in paragraph 253 of its 83rd Report, before submitting its definitive conclusions, to request the Government to be good enough to furnish the texts of the judgments given against Mr. Rodriguez da Silva and of the reasons adduced therein.

43. The 83rd Report of the Committee was approved by the Governing Body on 28 May 1965, in the course of its 162nd Session. The above request for further information was brought to the notice of the Government by a letter dated 3 June 1965. On 23 August 1965 the Government furnished the texts of the judgments given by the courts on 4 July 1951 and 15 March 1954 referred to in paragraph 40 above.

44. From the judgment of the Supreme Court of Lisbon given on 4 July 1951 it appears that Mr. Rodriguez da Silva, charged together with certain other persons, had been sentenced after it had been proved that he belonged to the Portuguese Communist party, described as a clandestine organisation seeking to change the constitution and overthrow the Government by violent means, had been found in possession of subversive propaganda and money belonging to the party, had used a cover name as an agent and organiser of the party, and had been found in possession of a Browning pistol and ammunition. The court reduced his sentence, as indicated in paragraph 40 above, because it was not proved that he intended to use the pistol " in pursuit of criminal purposes ".

45. The judgment of 15 March 1954 sentencing him to a further six months' imprisonment was based on proof that he had used a false identity in order to lease premises for the Communist party and had obtained forged identity papers.

46. These judgments appear to confirm that the sentences served by Mr. Rodriguez da Silva were imposed on grounds not connected with any trade union activities in which he might have been engaged.

47. In these circumstances the Committee recommends the Governing Body to decide that the case does not call for further examination.

Case No. 441:

Complaint Presented by the Latin American Confederation of Christian Trade Unionists against the Government of Paraguay

48. By a communication dated 13 May 1965 the Latin American Confederation of Christian Trade Unionists (C.L.A.S.C.) lodged a complaint alleging violation of freedom of association by the Government of Paraguay. This communication was transmitted to the Government, which sent its observations on 24 August 1965.

49. Paraguay has ratified the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), but not the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98).

50. C.L.A.S.C. alleges that Mr. Efigenio Fernández, General Secretary of the Christian Workers' Association (C.C.T.), was arrested on 9 May 1965 after protesting on behalf of C.C.T. against the arrest of Mr. Fulgencio Bareiro Rodas, Executive Secretary of C.L.A.S.C. for the Atlantic region. The complaint states that Mr. Bareiro Rodas was arrested in connection with a telegram he had received from an organisation of Cuban workers in exile, that Mr. Fernández was still under arrest at the time of the complaint and that no news had been received of him since his arrest.

51. With regard to Mr. Bareiro Rodas, Executive Secretary of C.L.A.S.C. for the Atlantic region, the Government explains in its communication of 24 August 1965 that his arrest was ordered with a view to investigating the wording of a telegram he had received referring to " mobilisation of organisations ". The Government believed that this expression might be interpreted in the sense of a rising by the trade unions with a view to overthrowing the established order. The Government further states that Mr. Bareiro Rodas was immediately released and it quotes the wording of the telegram, which was sent from Caracas and was signed by Mr. Eduardo García, who is Executive Secretary of C.L.A.S.C. for the Caribbean region according to the information available to the International Labour Office. The wording of the telegram as quoted by the Government is as follows:

Please mobilise C.L.A.S.C. organisations in zone to demand stoppage indiscriminate bombardment Dominican civilian population guarantee human rights and restoration of democracy and liberty and prevent unilateral intervention by United States.

52. The Committee believes it may understand that as soon as the authorities were convinced that the telegram was not intended for the purpose originally suspected they immediately released Mr. Bareiro Rodas. The text as transcribed does not relate specifically to trade union matters but rather to political action in regard to which the Committee is not competent.

53. In these circumstances the Committee, considering that the evidence submitted does not show that the measures taken by the authorities with regard to Mr. Bareiro Rodas constitute violation of freedom of association, recommends that the Governing Body decide that this aspect of the case does not call for further examination.

54. With regard to Mr. Fernández the Government states that he was arrested on the grounds of contempt of authority, as described in section 160 of the Penal Code, and was released on 19 May 1965.

55. Since the complainants state that Mr. Fernández was arrested on 9 May 1965, he would seem to have been under arrest for some ten days. The Committee concludes that the charges referred to in the previous paragraph were not maintained.

56. In numerous cases in the past the Committee has pointed out that in all cases in which trade union leaders are preventively detained these measures may involve a serious interference with the exercise of trade union rights; that it would appear necessary that they should be justified by a serious emergency; that, unless accompanied by adequate judicial safeguards applied within a reasonable period, they are open to criticism; and that it should be the policy of every government to ensure that human rights are properly safeguarded, particularly the right of all detained persons to receive a fair trial at the earliest possible moment.[1] The Committee has also pointed out that the detention by the authorities of trade unionists concerning whom no grounds for conviction are subsequently found is liable to involve restrictions of trade union rights.

57. In these circumstances the Committee recommends the Governing Body to note that Mr. Fernández has been released and to decide, therefore, while pointing out to the Government that the detention of trade unionists concerning whom no grounds for conviction are subsequently found is liable to involve restrictions of trade union rights, that this aspect of the case does not call for further examination.

58. In view of the above, and with regard to the case as a whole, the Committee recommends the Governing Body—

(a) as regards the arrest of Mr. Fulgencio Bareiro Rodas, to note that this trade union leader has been released, and to decide, for the reasons stated in paragraph 52 above, that this aspect of the case does not call for further examination;

(b) as regards the arrest of Mr. Efigenio Fernández, to note that this trade union leader has been released, and to decide, therefore, while pointing out to the Government that the detention of trade unionists concerning whom no grounds for conviction are subsequently found is liable to involve restrictions of trade union rights, that this aspect of the case does not call for further examination.

DEFINITIVE CONCLUSIONS IN THE CASES RELATING TO THE REPUBLIC OF SOUTH AFRICA (CASES NOS. 300, 311 AND 321), GREECE (CASE NO. 341), UNITED KINGDOM (BRITISH GUIANA) (CASE NO. 406), DOMINICAN REPUBLIC (CASE NO. 411) AND UNITED KINGDOM (ST. VINCENT) (CASE NO. 415)

Cases Nos. 300, 311 and 321:

Complaints Presented by the South African Congress of Trade Unions, the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, the World Federation of Trade Unions, the Food and Canning Workers' Union (Cape Town) and the Trade Unions International of Workers of the Food, Tobacco and Beverage Industries and Hotel, Café and Restaurant Workers (Trade Department of the World Federation of Trade Unions) against the Government of the Republic of South Africa

59. Complaints against the Republic of South Africa were submitted to the I.L.O. by the South African Congress of Trade Unions (S.A.C.T.U.) in communications dated 12 and 21 May, 9 June and 17 August 1962, and by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions in communications dated 11 September and 21 December 1962. These complaints raised a number of allegations, relating respectively to the South African national budget, to the prohibition of strikes by African workers, to anti-union propaganda carried on by government departments, to intimidation of African workers, to racial segregation within the trade unions, to job reservation, to measures taken against trade union leaders and members, to the South African delegation at the 46th Session of the International Labour Conference, and to various aspects of the provisions and application of the General Law Amendment Act, 1962. Observations on these complaints were furnished by the Government of the Republic of South Africa in a communication dated 17 January 1963, but they were confined to allegations made with respect to the General Law Amendment Act.

60. The above complaints and observations were examined, as Case No. 300, by the Committee at its meeting in February 1963, when the Committee submitted an interim report to the Governing Body in paragraphs 153 to 234 of its 68th Report, which was approved by the Governing Body at its 154th Session (March 1963). On the recommendation of the Committee the Governing Body dismissed the allegations relating to the South African national budget and to the South African delegation at the 46th Session of the International Labour Conference. The allegations relating to intimidation of African workers, which had also been raised in more detailed terms in Case No. 278, were subsequently dismissed by the Governing Body when adopting the Committee's recommendations in that case.[1] With regard to the allegations relating to segregation in trade unions and to job reservation, the Governing Body reaffirmed the conclusions it had adopted at earlier sessions with regard to similar allegations raised in previous cases relating to the then Union of South Africa. The allegations referred to in the present paragraph, therefore, are not dealt with further in this report.

61. The Governing Body requested [2] the Government to furnish further information on certain matters arising out of the allegations relating to the General Law Amendment Act, 1962. At the same time the Committee decided [3] to request the Government to furnish its observations on the allegations relating to the prohibition of strikes by African workers, to anti-union propaganda carried on by government departments, and to measures taken against trade union leaders and members, which had not been mentioned in the Government's reply dated 17 January 1963. The Committee also asked [1] the Government to furnish observations or further information on certain points relating to the General Law Amendment Act.

[1] See 72nd Report, paras. 39-54.

[2] See 68th Report, para. 234 (a).

62. The above requests for observations and further information on these outstanding allegations were conveyed to the Government by a letter dated 14 March 1963. On 3 May 1963 the Government asked for a copy of one of the documents in the case, which was sent to it on 10 May 1963. Further requests were addressed to the Government by letters dated 13 June and 22 November 1963, 3 March, 28 April, 22 June and 24 November 1964, and 10 March and 3 June 1965; also, with these or other letters, copies were sent of further complaints addressed to the I.L.O. by the South African Congress of Trade Unions on 19 February, 28 March, 13 and 22 May and 24 October 1963 and 11 and 30 January, 11 February and 26 April 1964, and by the World Federation of Trade Unions on 19 October 1963 and 13 February and 26 March 1964. No reply to any of these letters has been received.

63. On 7 November 1962 the Food and Canning Workers' Union (Cape Town) submitted a complaint relating to alleged acts of interference with the union. The matters raised being quite distinct from those raised in Case No. 300, this complaint was dealt with as Case No. 311. The complaint was transmitted to the Government by a letter dated 15 November 1962. In further communications dated 5 February 1963 and 1 March 1963 the complainant also raised allegations relating to measures taken against trade union leaders and members of a similar nature to those raised in Case No. 300. These communications were forwarded to the Government on 13 February and 12 March 1963 respectively. The complaint was supported by the Trade Unions International of Workers of the Food, Tobacco and Beverage Industries and, Hotel, Café and Restaurant Workers (trade department of the World Federation of Trade Unions), of which the complainant in Cape Town is an affiliate, in a letter dated 17 November 1962, transmitted to the Government on 6 December 1962. Further requests to the Government to furnish its observations were made by letters dated 9 May, 12 June and 22 November 1963, 3 March, 25 June and 24 November 1964, and 9 March and 4 June 1965. No reply to any of these letters has been received from the Government.

64. On 14 January 1963 the South African Congress of Trade Unions submitted a complaint relating to a list of organisations published by the Minister of Justice and the placing of restrictions on the scope of their officers and membership. This was a new allegation and the complaint was dealt with as Case No. 321. The complaint was transmitted to the Government, for its observations, on 29 January 1963. Subsequent complaints, on the same matter but dealing also with matters raised in Cases Nos. 300 and 311, were addressed to the I.L.O. by the South African Congress of Trade Unions and the World Federation of Trade Unions on 11 February and 2 March 1963 respectively and transmitted to the Government on 12 March 1963. Further requests to the Government to furnish its observations were made in letters dated 9 May, 13 June and 22 November 1963, 3 March, 25 June and 24 November 1964, and 8 March and 4 June 1965. No reply to any of these letters has been received from the Government.

65. In view of the fact that the subsequent documents of complaint in Cases Nos. 311 and 321 raise matters analogous to certain of the questions raised in Case No. 300, the Committee has considered it appropriate to examine the three cases together, in accordance with the procedure which it has followed in certain earlier cases in comparable circumstances.[2]

66. According to the procedure for the examination of complaints of alleged infringements of freedom of association it is the function of the Committee to make its examination of cases submitted to it, including the consideration of any observations made by the governments concerned, " if received within a reasonable period of time ".[1] Moreover, in any case in which a government does not respond within a reasonable period to a request for more detailed information, the Committee " will report the circumstances to the Governing Body ".[2] In Case No. 300 eight separate requests for further information and observations on new complaints have been addressed to the Government since 13 June 1963; it has been asked on 12 occasions since 15 November 1962 in Case No. 311, and on ten occasions since 29 January 1963 in Case No. 321, to furnish its observations on the complaints in those cases. The Committee has now to inform the Governing Body that no acknowledgment of any of these 30 communications has ever been received from the Government. In these circumstances the Committee has now examined the cases on their merits, taking account of the evidence submitted by the complainants together with such information as was furnished by the Government in its communication dated 17 January 1963.

67. The Republic of South Africa has not ratified the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), or the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98).

Allegations relating to the Provisions concerning Sabotage in the General Law Amendment Act, 1962

68. These allegations and the Government's observations thereon were examined by the Committee at its meeting in February 1963 and dealt with in detail in paragraphs 186 to 213 of its 68th Report. The matter is analysed more briefly below.

69. The South African Congress of Trade Unions (S.A.C.T.U.) in its communications dated 21 May and 9 June 1962, and the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (I.C.F.T.U.), in its communication dated 11 September 1962, alleged that the effect of section 21 of the General Law Amendment Act, which created the new offence of " sabotage " and made it punishable by death by hanging or a minimum sentence of five years' imprisonment, was that any white, Indian or coloured workers who went on strike contrary to the provisions of the Industrial Conciliation Act, 1956, and any African workers who went on strike under any circumstances, could be prosecuted for sabotage and sentenced to death.

70. In its communication dated 17 January 1963 the Government declared that acts which were lawful under the Industrial Conciliation Act, 1956, or the Railways and Harbours Service Act, 1960, were not rendered unlawful by the General Law Amendment Act, the provisions of which were " not aimed at interfering in any way with the exercise of bona fide trade union rights ".

71. The Committee, therefore, after examining the text of section 21 of the General Law Amendment Act, reached the following conclusion in paragraph 205 of its 68th Report:

It would seem clear, therefore, that any act by a registered union or any member or members thereof which is not lawful under the 1956 Act would be a " wrongful " act in the terms of section 21 of the 1962 Act if it otherwise satisfied the definition of sabotage set forth therein. Any strike whatsoever by African workers is a " wrongful " act because it is specifically unlawful in all cases according to the Native Labour (Settlement of Disputes) Act, 1953.

72. The Committee then proceeded to consider whether section 21 could be applied in the manner alleged, because, in addition to the act being " wrongful ", it had also to have one or more of the effects set forth in section 21 (1), in order to give rise to a prosecution for sabotage.

[1] See First Report, para. 25.

[2] Ibid., para. 31.

73. The Committee had before it the full text of subsections (1) and (2) of section 21 of the Act, reading as follows [1]:

(1) Subject to the provisions of subsection (2), any person who commits any wrongful and wilful act whereby he injures, damages, destroys, renders useless or unserviceable, puts out of action, obstructs, tampers with, pollutes, contaminates or endangers—

(a) the health or safety of the public;

(b) the maintenance of law and order;

(c) any water supply;

(d) the supply or distribution at any place of light, power, fuel, foodstuffs or water, or of sanitary, medical or fire-extinguishing services;

(e) any postal, telephone or telegraph services or installations, or radio-transmitting, broadcasting or receiving services or installations;

(f) the free movement of any traffic on land, at sea or in the air;

(g) any property, whether movable or immovable, of any other person or of the State, or who attempts to commit, or conspires with any other person to aid or procure the commission of or to commit, or incites, instigates, commands, aids, advises, encourages or procures any other person to commit, any such act, or who in contravention of any law possesses any explosives, fire-arm or weapon or enters or is upon any land or building or part of a building, shall be guilty of the offence of sabotage and liable on conviction to the penalties provided for by law for the offence of treason: provided that, except where the death penalty is imposed, the imposition of a sentence of imprisonment for a period of not less than five years shall be compulsory, whether or not any other penalty is also imposed.

(2) No person shall be convicted of any offence under subsection (1) if he proves that the commission of the alleged offence, objectively regarded, was not calculated and that such offence was not committed with intent to produce any of the following effects, namely—

(a) to cause or promote general dislocation, disturbance or disorder;

(b) to cripple or seriously prejudice any industry or undertaking or industries or undertakings generally or the production or distribution of commodities or foodstuffs at any place;

(c) to seriously hamper or to deter any person from assisting in the maintenance of law and order;

(d) to cause, encourage or further an insurrection or forcible resistance to the Government;

(e) to further or encourage the achievement of any political aim, including the bringing about of any social or economic change in the Republic;

(f) to cause serious bodily injury to or seriously endanger the safety of any person;

(g) to cause substantial financial loss to any person or to the State;

(h) to cause, encourage or further feelings of hostility between different sections of the population of the Republic;

(i) to seriously interrupt the supply or distribution at any place of light, power, fuel or water, or of sanitary, medical or fire-extinguishing services;

(j) to embarrass the administration of the affairs of the State.

74. The Committee observed that the complainants had made the following contentions. Firstly, they claimed that any strike by African workers could be prosecuted as a " wrongful and wilful act " if it " obstructs . . . or endangers . . . the maintenance of law and order " or " injures " the property of any person. Secondly, special attention was drawn to the situation of workers in certain specified occupations in relation to the definition of sabotage as including wrongful and wilful acts which " [injure, render] unserviceable, [put] out of action," etc., " any water supply . . . the supply or distribution at any place of light, power, fuel, foodstuffs or water, or of sanitary, medical or fire-extinguishing services . . . any postal, telephone or telegraph services ", etc. Thirdly, it was contended, any person who painted a " higher wages " slogan on the wall of a building faced the death penalty for sabotage because he thereby " injured " or " damaged " property. Fourthly, it was alleged that if a trade union organiser went inside factory premises to enlist new members or address the workers without the consent of the factory owner, he could be charged with sabotage. Fifthly, it was claimed, if a participant in a big strike for higher wages was unable, in terms of section 21 (2), to show that his strike was not likely to " cause substantial financial loss " to the employer, he could be convicted of sabotage. Finally, the complainants alleged, if a trade union organiser, when organising workers to put demands to employers, referred to the employers in a hostile way and then failed to show that " objectively " his act was not likely to " cause . . . feelings of hostility ", he could be convicted of sabotage.

75. The Committee therefore, in paragraph 234 (a) of its 68th Report, recommended the Governing Body—to ask the Government whether it can be assumed from the reply which it has been good enough to furnish . . . that no trade union or officers or members thereof pursuing trade union purposes (some examples of which are noted in [the preceding paragraph]), whether it is a registered trade union or not and irrespective of the races constituting its membership, would be liable to prosecution under section 21 of the General Law Amendment Act, 1962, or whether, on the other hand, the Government's reply is to be interpreted as meaning that the activities of one race are exempted from the application of that section while the activities of another race are not so exempted.

76. The Government has failed on eight occasions to reply to requests to furnish the above information.

77. Also at its meeting in February 1963 the Committee observed that section 21 (2) of the Act placed a serious burden of proof on the accused. It appeared that, if the State made out merely a prima facie case in terms of section 21 (1), the accused had to show that the offence, objectively regarded, was not calculated and was not committed with intent to produce " any " of the effects enumerated in section 21 (2), including " the bringing about of any social or economic change in the Republic " or " to embarrass the administration of the affairs of the State ". This language was so broad as to appear to exclude any action which would be regarded as suggesting any change in existing social or economic conditions or any kind of public inconvenience.

78. The Governing Body therefore decided, on the recommendation of the Committee, to draw the attention of the Government to its view that the provisions of section 21 (2) of the General Law Amendment Act, 1962, were inconsistent with generally accepted principles relating to freedom of association.

79. Since that time there have been further developments. In a communication dated 13 February 1964 the World Federation of Trade Unions alleged that, because of their trade union activities, the following 11 officials of S.A.C.T.U. had been accused of sabotage in the Pietermaritzburg court: Messrs. Billy Nair, Currie Ndhlovu, Solomon Mbanjwa, Bennett Nkosi, Alfred Duma, F. Mdhlalose, Riot Mkwanazi, M. O. Mkize, Joshua Zulu, David Ndawonde, Mathews Mayiwa, and three more in the Port Elizabeth court: Messrs. Caleb Nayikiso, V. Mini and L. Mancoke. Mr. Raymond Mhlaba, Secretary of the African Laundry and Dry Cleaning Workers' Union, and Mr. Elias Motsoaledi, Chairman of the Furniture, Bedding and Mattress Workers' Union and former Chairman of the Council of Non-European Trade Unions, were accused of treason and sabotage in the Pretoria court. With one exception, all these persons were non-Europeans.

80. In a communication dated 26 March 1964 W.F.T.U. stated that Mr. V. Mini and two other S.A.C.T.U. members, Mr. W. Khayingo and Mr. Z. Mkaba, had been sentenced to death, and that Mr. Billy Nair had been sentenced to 20 years' imprisonment.

81. The Government has failed to reply to six successive requests to furnish its observations on the last-mentioned complaint.

82. In these circumstances the Committee recommends the Governing Body—

(a) to deplore the fact that the Government of the Republic of South Africa has failed to furnish the further information requested of it, as indicated in paragraph 234 (a) of the 68th Report of the Committee cited in paragraph 75 above, on repeated occasions, or to reply to the several requests made to it to furnish observations on the grave cases of prosecution of trade unionists for sabotage—in three of which cases sentence of death was pronounced—referred to in paragraphs 79 and 80 above;

(b) to point out in these circumstances that the Government has failed to refute the allegations that trade union officers and members are liable to be prosecuted for sabotage and sentenced to death under the General Law Amendment Act, 1962, in the event of their having performed any of the trade union activities indicated in paragraph 74 above;

(c) to point out to the Government that, by virtue of the fact that strike action by African workers is always an unlawful act under the Native Labour (Settlement of Disputes) Act, 1953, and therefore wrongful under section 21 of the General Law Amendment Act, 1962, whereas strike action by other workers is not wrongful in this sense when it is not unlawful in terms of the Industrial Conciliation Act, 1956, or the Railways and Harbours Service Act, 1960, the provisions of section 21 are discriminatory against a particular race;

(d) to point out to the Government that, in the case of other races, these provisions are discriminatory against the officers and members of non-registered organisations;

(e) to reaffirm its previous statement of its view that the provisions of section 21 (2) of the General Law Amendment Act, 1962, are inconsistent with generally accepted principles relating to freedom of association.

Allegations relating to Measures Taken against Trade Union Leaders and Members

83. These allegations fall under two heads: firstly, those concerning measures taken pursuant to the Suppression of Communism Act, as amended and supplemented by the General Law Amendment Act, 1962, and secondly, measures taken under various other legal provisions not directly related to those two acts.

(a) Measures Taken pursuant to the Suppression of Communism Act and the General Law Amendment Act.

84. In its communication dated 12 May 1962 S.A.C.T.U. referred to the large number of banning orders served on trade union leaders and members, since the middle of 1961, pursuant to the Suppression of Communism Act.

85. In particular Mr. Leon Levy (President of S.A.C.T.U.), Mr. Melville Fletcher (Branch Secretary of the Textile Workers' Union, Durban) and Mr. B. Nair (Secretary of the Metal Workers' Union, Durban), were alleged to have been confined to a certain area and also to have been banned from attending any gathering for five years, the latter restriction attaching also to Mr. Mark Williams-Shope (General Secretary of S.A.C.T.U.).

86. Mr. Harry Gwala (Secretary of the Pietermaritzburg Committee of S.A.C.T.U.) was alleged to have been prohibited from any participation in the affairs of S.A.C.T.U.

87. In its communication dated 21 May 1962 S.A.C.T.U., after referring to the fact that under the Suppression of Communism Act the Minister had already ordered the resignation of over 50 trade union officials as being " statutory Communists " alleged that the General Law Amendment Act, 1962, which had amended and supplemented the Suppression of Communism Act, could be used to force the resignation of union officials who had not even been " convicted of statutory communism "; if the Minister prohibited a person from attending gatherings or placed a person under house arrest because he was satisfied that his activities might further the objects of " statutory communism ", he could also order him to resign from his union and not become an official or member of that or any other body. The same allegation (based on section 4 of the 1962 Act) was made by I.C.F.T.U. in its communication dated 11 September 1962.

88. S.A.C.T.U. alleged further that, in addition to the case of " statutory Communists ", any person whose activities were likely to further the objects of statutory communism could be placed under what amounted to house arrest. In its communication dated 11 September 1962 I.C.F.T.U. referred to the provisions of section 8 of the 1962 Act as permitting the Minister to prohibit any such person from being within or absenting himself from a mentioned place or area or communicating with any person. In its communication dated 21 December 1962 I.C.F.T.U. gave the names of 12 trade union officers alleged to have been the subject of such measures. They included Messrs. Levy, Nair and Williams-Shope referred to earlier and nine other officers of S.A.C.T.U. affiliates.

89. In its communication dated 21 May 1962 S.A.C.T.U. stated that a person dealt with in any manner whatsoever pursuant to the Suppression of Communism Act could, under the 1962 Act, be ordered by the Minister to report to the police at given times and to inform the police of any change of address or employment. These provisions, declared the I.C.F.T.U. in its communication dated 11 September 1962, were embodied in sections 9 and 10 (a) of the 1962 Act.

90. Both complainants alleged that any breach of the various restrictions mentioned above was punishable by a minimum of three and a maximum of ten years' imprisonment.

91. They alleged also that any person in possession of a banned periodical was liable to up to three years' imprisonment.

92. In its communication dated 21 May 1962 S.A.C.T.U. alleged that the 1962 Act gave the Minister increased powers to ban gatherings and to prohibit individuals from attending them. Under the 1962 Act it was a crime, punishable by up to three years' imprisonment, to reproduce in any way the speech or statement of a person banned from gatherings. This was the position, declared I.C.F.T.U. in its communication dated 11 September 1962, in consequence of section 19 of the Act of 1962.

93. In its communication dated 17 August 1962 S.A.C.T.U. set forth the situation at that time, by virtue of the 1962 Act, arising from the banning as statutory Communists of four of the leading officials of S.A.C.T.U. As a result of the extended powers given to the Minister by the Act of 1962 none of these union officers could issue any statement on any matter affecting S.A.C.T.U. members or workers generally; they could not address leaflets to their members; if the secretary of a local committee or an affiliated union received a letter from the National President or General Secretary of S.A.C.T.U. he could not read it to his own executive committee; press organs of the unions could not reproduce even statements made before the enactment of the 1962 Act, such as extracts from the report of the General Secretary or the presidential address to the National Trade Union Conference.

94. When the Committee considered the foregoing allegations at its meeting in February 1963 it observed [1] that, in its communication dated 17 January 1963, the Government had confined itself to stating in this connection that the provisions of the 1962 Act were intended to prevent the dissemination of Communist propaganda and to prevent " the inciting speeches by persons who, because of their support of the Communist cause, have been banned from attending meetings " being recorded or read to audiences at meetings or being published in newspapers supporting Communist ideologies. In these circumstances the Committee decided to request the Government to furnish more detailed observations on these allegations. This request has been conveyed to the Government on repeated occasions but no reply has been received.

95. Since that time there have been the following further developments.

96. In a communication dated 19 February 1963 S.A.C.T.U. declared that, pursuant to the Suppression of Communism Act, Mr. Mosata, President of the African General Workers' Union, Kimberley, had been confined to Kimberley for five years and prohibited from attending gatherings or entering factories, mines or mine compounds. In its communications dated 28 March 1963 and 13 May 1963 S.A.C.T.U. referred to similar bans served on Mr. L. Ndzanga, Secretary of the South African Railway and Harbours Non-European Workers' Union (Transvaal), Mr. G. Ngqunge, organiser of the Cape Province organisation of the same union, Mr. C. Ndlovu, Secretary of its Natal organisation—all of whom were also forced to resign from their union offices—and Mrs. Moodley, organiser of the Food and Canning Workers' Union, East Rand.

97. In a communication dated 24 October 1963 S.A.C.T.U. alleged that banning orders had been served on its Vice-President, Mrs. Viola Hashe, and its Assistant General Secretary, Mrs. Phyllis Altman, who had never even been " warned " or " listed " under the Suppression of Communism Act or its amendments, confining them to a given area for five years, prohibiting them for five years from attending any political, social or educational gathering or entering any educational premises, from entering any factory or area within which coloured, Indian or African persons resided and from preparing, purchasing, etc., any material for publication, and requiring them to report to the police once a week for five years. This part of the complaint was supported by W.F.T.U. in a communication dated 19 October 1963.

98. S.A.C.T.U. annexed to this complaint a list of 16 of its officers banned and removed from office since 1 February 1963.

99. S.A.C.T.U., in communications dated 30 January, 11 February and 24 April 1964, and W.F.T.U., in a communication dated 13 February 1964, gave the names of eight more officials of S.A.C.T.U. and its affiliates subjected to banning orders and forced to give up trade union office.

100. According to a communication dated 14 January 1963 from S.A.C.T.U. the Minister of Justice issued a proclamation in the Government Gazette, Extraordinary, No. 408, of 28 December 1962 containing a list of 36 organisations, including S.A.C.T.U. but consisting mainly of organisations other than trade unions, and prohibiting from office or membership in such organisations 432 persons listed under the Suppression of Communism Act and, among others, any person, whether in such list or not, banned by the Minister from attending gatherings. The ban attaching to S.A.C.T.U. extended to all its affiliates and subsidiaries and any body promoting the objects of S.A.C.T.U. The consequence was that six S.A.C.T.U. officers, Messrs. Levy, Williams-Shope, Nair, Fletcher, Benine and Rammitloa were required to resign their union positions prior to 1 February 1963. The same matters were raised in its communication dated 2 March 1963 by the W.F.T.U., which added the names of two further persons similarly affected: Mrs. Frances Baard, Port Elizabeth Branch Secretary of the African Food and Canning Workers' Union, and Mr. L. Kukulela, Cape Province Secretary of the Hospital Workers' Union and the African Laundry Workers' Union. The case of these two further persons was also raised by S.A.C.T.U. in a communication dated 11 February 1963.

101. In communications dated 5 February and 1 March 1963 the Food and Canning Workers' Union (Cape Town), after referring to the case of Mrs. Baard, gave the names of ten other officials of the Union removed from office in similar circumstances.

102. Another and even more serious aspect of the measures taken against trade unionists under the General Law Amendment Act was raised by S.A.C.T.U. in its communications dated 13 and 22 May 1963. The complainant alleged that pursuant to section 17 of the General Law Amendment Act, which permits of detention for 90 days without trial, a period which can be renewed indefinitely, the following persons were held in solitary confinement, " for interrogation " and without any charge being brought and without being permitted to have access to their legal advisers or their families: Mr. L. Levy, former National President of S.A.C.T.U., Mr. S. Mlamini, National President of S.A.C.T.U., Mr. C. Mayekiso, Port Elizabeth Secretary of S.A.C.T.U., Mr. V. Mini, Secretary of the Metal Workers' Union (Port Elizabeth), Mr. L. Mancoko, Secretary of the General Workers' Union (Port Elizabeth), and Mr. E. Loza, Secretary of the Commercial and Distributive Workers' Union (Cape Town). In a further communication dated 24 October 1963 S.A.C.T.U. gave the names of 35 S.A.C.T.U. officials and members detained under the " 90 days clause " stating that the five persons other than Mr. Levy named above had by that time been held in solitary confinement for 150 days without ever being charged. Mr. Mlamini, acording to a communication from W.F.T.U. dated 13 February 1964, was eventually sentenced to nine months' imprisonment for distributing a leaflet calling a regional conference of workers and peasants in December 1962.

103. All these various documents of complaint were submitted to the Government for its observations. The Government has never acknowledged any of the repeated requests made to it to furnish observations on the complaints.

104. When the Committee, in Case No. 63, examined earlier cases of trade union leaders having been banned from public and trade union life by operation of the Suppression of Communism Act, 1950, it submitted to the Governing Body the conclusions contained in paragraphs 268 to 276 of its 12th Report. Paragraph 276 reads as follows:

> In so far as the South African Act of 1950 was enacted, as the Government contends, purely for a political reason, namely that of barring Communists in general, as citizens, from all public life, the Committee considers that the matter is one of internal national policy with which it is not competent to deal and on which it should therefore refrain from expressing any view. However, in view of the fact that measures of a political nature may have an indirect effect on the exercise of trade union rights, the Committee wishes to draw the attention of the South African Government to the views which it has expressed . . . with regard, first, to the principle that workers, without distinction whatsoever, should have the right to join organisations of their own choosing and, secondly, to the importance of due process in cases in which measures of a political nature may indirectly affect the exercise of trade union rights. Consequently, the Committee recommends the Governing Body to communicate the above conclusions to the Government of the Union of South Africa.

105. The Committee reaffirmed the conclusions contained in paragraphs 268 to 276 of its 12th Report in subsequent cases relating to South Africa.[1] Now that the Suppression of Communism Act has been amended by the General Law Amendment Act, 1962, for the specific purpose of strengthening the provisions of the earlier Act, these general conclusions still hold good and the Committee accordingly reaffirms them.

106. There remains, however, the question as to the manner in which the legal provisions are in fact applied to trade union leaders and members as such.

107. It is clear from the evidence in the present and earlier cases viewed cumulatively that under the Suppression of Communism Act a trade union leader can be removed from and disqualified for trade union office membership and/or confined to a particular area and prohibited from attending gatherings, not merely if it is proven that he is a Communist or if he is or has been a professed Communist or a member of a Communist party or organisation, but on the mere ground that the competent minister has " warned " him as a Communist, a proceeding entirely within the discretion of the M nister in the course of which the person concerned has no opportunity to defend himself and against which there is no right of appeal to the courts. Prior to the General Law Amendment Act, 1962, such a person was referred to as a " statutory Communist ". The General Law Amendment Act has considerably aggravated the position. The position now is that a trade unionist can be barred from union office and membership, made to report regularly to the police, confined to a given area, barred from attending gatherings or communicating with his trade union colleagues and kept in solitary confinement for periods of 90 days, which can be renewed indefinitely, entirely at the discretion of the Minister—all this even without having been designated a " statutory Communist "—because in the view of the Minister his activities might further the interests of statutory communism. No recourse to the courts in any form exists. All these points have been alleged and substantiated in detail by the different complainants and the Government has submitted no observations at all in refutation.

[1] See 15th Report, Case No. 102, para. 185 (1); 24th Report, Case No. 145, para. 209 (1); 66th Report Case No. 261, para. 185 (a); 67th Report, Case No. 288, para. 135 (a); 70th Report, Case No. 314, para. 97.

108. Certain principles enunciated on many occasions by the Committee and the Governing Body are brought into question by these legal provisions.

109. In a number of cases [1] the Committee has observed that the public authorities should refrain from any interference which would restrict the right of occupational organisations to elect their representatives in full freedom and to organise their administration and activities. The provisions of the Suppression of Communism Act and the General Law Amendment Act which permit the Minister in his discretion to remove trade union leaders from trade union office and to disqualify them for such office in the future are incompatible with this generally accepted principle.

110. The Committee has also pointed out in earlier cases that in all cases in which trade union leaders are preventively detained these measures may involve a serious interference with the exercise of trade union rights, and has emphasised the right of all detained persons to receive a fair trial at the earliest possible moment.[2] The Committee has also expressed the view [3] that the restriction of a person's movements to a limited area accompanied by a prohibition of entry into the area in which his trade union operates and in which he normally carries on his trade union functions is also inconsistent with the normal enjoyment of the right of association and with the exercise of the right to carry on trade union activities and functions, and should also be accompanied by adequate judicial safeguards applied within a reasonable period and, especially, by observance of the right of those concerned to receive a fair trial at the earliest possible moment. The Committee considers that the provisions of the Suppression of Communism Act and the General Law Amendment Act which permit the Minister in his discretion to confine trade union leaders to a particular area, to prohibit them from entering the areas in which they normally carry on their trade union activities, and to hold them in solitary confinement for a 90 days' period which can be renewed, without trial or even without charges being laid, are incompatible with the right to exercise trade union activities and functions and with the principle of fair trial enunciated above.

111. The Committee therefore recommends the Governing Body—

(a) to draw the attention of the Government to the importance which the Governing Body attaches to the principle that the public authorities should refrain from any interference which would restrict the right of occupational organisations to elect their representatives in full freedom and to organise their administration and activities;

(b) to express the view that the provisions of the Suppression of Communism Act and the General Law Amendment Act which permit the Minister in his discretion to remove trade union leaders from trade union office and to disqualify them for such office in the future are incompatible with this generally accepted principle and have been consistently applied in practice in a manner incompatible with the said principle;

(c) to draw the attention of the Government to the fact that in all cases in which trade union leaders are preventively detained these measures may involve a serious interference with the exercise of trade union rights and to the importance which the Governing Body attaches to the right of all detained persons to receive a fair trial at the earliest possible moment;

(d) to express its view that the restriction of a person's movements to a limited area accompanied by a prohibition of entry into the area in which his trade union operates and in which he normally carries on his trade union functions is also inconsistent with the normal enjoyment of the right of association and with the exercise of the right to carry on trade union activities and functions, and should also be accompanied by adequate judicial safeguards applied within a reasonable period and, especially, by observance of the right of those concerned to receive a fair trial at the earliest possible moment;

(e) to draw the attention of the Government to its view that the provisions of the Suppression of Communism Act and the General Law Amendment Act which permit the Minister in his discretion to confine trade union leaders to a particular area, to prohibit them from entering the areas in which they normally carry on their trade union activities and to hold them in solitary confinement for a 90 days' period which can be renewed, without trial and even without charges being laid, are incompatible with the right to exercise trade union activities and functions and with the principle of fair trial enunciated above and have consistently been applied in a manner incompatible with the said right and the said principle.

(b) Other Measures Taken against Trade Unionists.

112. In its communication dated 12 May 1962 S.A.C.T.U. made the following allegations. Mr. U. Maleka (Secretary of the Furniture, Mattress and Bedding Workers' Union) and Mr. R. Takalo (Secretary of the Metal Workers' Union, Transvaal) were arrested while helping to distribute leaflets to African mineworkers and were convicted of an offence under the Trespass Act, 1959. Mr. B. Ndavemavota (organiser for the National Organising Committee for Mineworkers), also arrested when distributing leaflets, was sentenced to three months' imprisonment under the Urban Areas Act. Mr. R. Bapela (member of the Clothing Workers' Union) was also arrested when distributing leaflets. Mr. M. Lekhoto (organiser of the Transvaal General Workers' Union), Mr. J. Mebena (member of the Shop and Office Workers' Union) and Mr. L. Ndzanga (Secretary of the South African Railways and Harbour Workers' Union) were arrested in connection with a placard demonstration. Mr. C. Nixishe (organiser of the South African Railways and Harbour Workers' Union) was convicted of an offence under the Trespass Act, 1959. Finally, Mr. D. Sebolai and Mr. J. Mampie (respectively Assistant President and Organising Secretary of the African General Workers' Union, Kimberley) and four members of the union were stated to be awaiting trial on a charge of entering a reserve without permission.

113. While the Government has furnished no observations on these allegations the complainants have not indicated the nature of the leaflets and placards in connection with the distribution or demonstration of which the persons concerned were arrested. However, certain of the laws they were charged with violating are statutes which in themselves restrict the exercise of trade union rights on racial grounds, so that the Committee does not consider that it would be justified in recommending the dismissal of the allegations out of hand.

114. In these circumstances the Committee recommends the Governing Body to note that the evidence before it does not enable it to reach firm conclusions on these particular allegations.

Allegations relating to the Suppression of and Restrictions on Newspapers pursuant to the Suppression of Communism Act and the General Law Amendment Act and the Publications and Entertainments Bill

115. It was alleged by S.A.C.T.U., in its communication dated 21 May 1962, that since 1950 the Minister of Justice, using his powers under the Suppression of Communism Act, had banned three newspapers—The Guardian, Advance and Clarion—but that, until 1962, a newspaper thus banned could reappear under an assumed name. Under the General Law Amendment Act, 1962, however, a newspaper banned under the 1950 Act would forfeit the £10,000 which it must, under the Act of 1962, deposit in advance with the Minister of the Interior. In the view of the complainant this would effectively prevent any workers' newspaper from reappearing once it was banned. The complainants also alleged that the Publications and Entertainments Bill conferred upon the authorities the power to prohibit the printing, publication and distribution of any " undesirable " literature, the definition of " undesirable " being so wide as to make it possible to suppress trade union statements and publications which expressed hostility to employers or instigated strike action. So far as the General Law Amendment Act is concerned I.C.F.T.U. made the same allegations in its communication dated 11 September 1962.

116. In its communication dated 17 January 1963 the Government stated that one aim of the Act of 1950 was defeated by reason of the fact that a newspaper which was banned because it disseminated Communist propaganda could simply reappear under a new name. This loophole had been closed by the 1962 Act.

117. Examining these allegations at its meeting in February 1963[1], the Committee observed that in a number of previous cases[2] it had expressed the view that the right to express opinions through the press is clearly one of the essential elements of trade union rights. It appeared to the Committee that, having regard to that principle, it might place a very considerable hardship on any small trade union if it were required to deposit so large a sum as £10,000 before it could issue a newspaper. The Committee therefore requested the Government to state whether all trade unions were required to deposit such a bond in the case of specifically trade union newspapers and also to furnish its observations on the allegation relating to the Publications and Entertainments Bill.

118. Despite repeated requests, the Government has furnished no further observations and has not, therefore, refuted the complainants' contention that all newspapers must furnish a £10,000 bond under the Act of 1962, this being an intolerable burden for small trade unions. On the other hand, the complainants have not submitted later information to show whether the clauses of the Publications and Entertainments Bill complained of were enacted in the terms alleged.

119. The Committee, therefore, recommends the Governing Body—

(a) to reaffirm its view that the right to express opinions through the press is clearly one of the essential elements of trade union rights;

(b) to express the view that if, as alleged, trade union newspapers are required to furnish a £10,000 bond, this would constitute, especially in the case of smaller unions, such an unreasonable condition for their existence as to be incompatible with the exercise of the foregoing right;

(c) to express further its view that, if the provisions of the Publications and Entertainments Bill concerning " undesirable literature " have been or were to be enacted in the terms alleged, this would permit of such abusive interpretation in the discretion of the authorities as to be incompatible with the right of trade unions to express opinions through the press.

Allegations relating to the Banning of Organisations under the General Law Amendment Act

120. In their communications dated 21 May and 11 September 1962 S.A.C.T.U. and I.C.F.T.U. respectively alleged that the General Law Amendment Act widened further the powers of state presidents to ban organisations, permitting them to ban " any organisation that carried on or has been established for the purpose of carrying on directly or indirectly any of the activities of an unlawful organisation ". It was alleged that, if the Minister " is satisfied ", for example, that a trade union is carrying on some of the activities which were once carried on by the unlawful African National Congress (e.g. campaigning for a minimum £1 a day for all workers, or demanding the repeal of " pass " laws), he may ban that union. This being a discretionary matter, the Court could not overrule the state president in the absence of proof that he acted in bad faith. In the view of I.C.F.T.U. these provisions infringed the generally accepted principle that workers' organisations shall not be dissolved or suspended by administrative authority.

121. In its communication dated 17 January 1963 the Government referred to these allegations only indirectly, when it stated that one of the weaknesses of the Suppression of Communism Act which it had to remedy was the fact that, despite the banning of the Communist party, Communist activities could be continued by merely giving a new name to an organisation which was, in fact, the Communist party.

122. When it examined [1] this aspect of the case at its meeting in February 1963 the Committee, observing the specific nature of the allegations made, recalled the principle laid down in the procedure for the examination of complaints of alleged infringements of trade union rights that, where precise allegations are made, the Committee cannot regard as satisfactory replies from governments which are confined to generalities.[2] The Committee therefore requested the Government to furnish more detailed observations on these allegations. No reply has been received from the Government to the repeated requests made to it to furnish such observations.

123. It appears from the unrefuted evidence submitted by the complainants that the General Law Amendment Act permits the competent authorities in their discretion to ban any organisation which carries on any normally legal trade union activity, such as campaigning for a minimum wage, if that activity has at any time figured in the programme of any trade union or other organisation which has been declared to be unlawful.

124. The Committee therefore recommends the Governing Body to draw the attention of the Government to its view that the provisions in question are incompatible with the generally accepted principle that the public authorities should refrain from any interference which would restrict the right of workers' organisations to organise their activities and to formulate their programmes or impede the lawful exercise of this right.

Allegations relating to the Provisions of the General Law Amendment Act concerning the Offence of Illegally Leaving the National Territory

125. Under the Departure from the Union Regulation Act, 1955, any person who leaves South Africa without a passport commits an offence punishable by a minimum of three months' imprisonment. In its communication dated 21 May 1962 S.A.C.T.U. alleged that the General Law Amendment Act has amended the Criminal Code in order to permit the State to prove the offence more easily so as to provide that any document which indicates that a person has been outside the Republic is prima facie evidence that he was outside the country, if it is accompanied by a certificate from the Secretary of Foreign Affairs that the document is of foreign origin.

126. When it examined this question at its meeting in February 1963 the Committee observed that, while the Government did not comment on the matter, the complainants had made no allegation concerning the application of these provisions, either generally or in any specific case, in such a manner as to affect the exercise of trade union rights.[1] The Committee therefore recommended the Governing Body to decide that these allegations did not call for further examination.

[1] See 68th Report, paras. 218-220.

[2] See First Report, para. 31.

127. In a communication dated 28 March 1963 S.A.C.T.U. alleged that Mr. John Gaitsewe, its Acting General Secretary, had been sentenced to two years' imprisonment, on 25 March 1963, for leaving the country without travel documents to attend a trade union conference overseas. In his speech in the court, Mr. Gaitsewe said that he had been forced to leave the country in this way because the Government would not grant passports to any Africans who did not support the Government's cause. The same allegations were made by W.F.T.U. in a communication dated 2 March 1963.

128. The Government has not furnished any observations on the case of Mr. Gaitsewe and, more particularly, has not refuted the allegation that Africans who do not support the Government's cause are not granted passports permitting them to leave the country to attend trade union conferences abroad.

129. The Committee has emphasised in several cases in the past that national trade union organisations should have the right to affiliate with international organisations of workers and has affirmed that this right normally carries with it the right of representatives of national organisations to maintain contact with the international organisations with which they are affiliated and to take part in the work of those organisations.[2]

130. In these circumstances the Committee recommends the Governing Body to draw the attention of the Government to the importance which it attaches to the principle enunciated in the preceding paragraph.

Allegations relating to the Prohibition of Strikes by African Workers

131. In its communication dated 12 May 1962 S.A.C.T.U. referred to the penalties of fines and imprisonment prescribed by the Native Labour (Settlement of Disputes) Act, 1953, and the General Law Amendment Act in respect of strikes by African workers. Despite these restrictions there were 453 reported strikes of African workers during the period 1954-60, it was alleged, as a result of which some 40,000 African workers were prosecuted, many of them having been fined or imprisoned.

132. In August 1961, it was alleged, 80 blind African workers at the Constance Caworth Institute for the Blind (Natal), earning only £10 a month or about one-third of the estimated living wage, went on strike for higher wages; the police were called and all the workers were dismissed, following which they were told to apply for readmission, but 13 were not re-engaged and no wage increase was granted.

133. Also in August 1961, it was alleged, 136 workers of the Lion Match Company (Durban) were each fined £5, with the alternative of ten days' imprisonment, on a charge of conducting an illegal strike, because they had held a lunch-time demonstration and exhibited placards demanding union recognition and a wage of £1 a day; leave to appeal was refused.

134. The complainant stated that workers employed by Klipfontein Organic Products (Transvaal) were recruited through the (Government) Bantu Administration Department and lived in compounds on a poverty wage of £7 per month, plus food and accommodation; their only chance to have grievances redressed was to apply to the Bantu Native Commissioner, who, it was alleged, whenever a complaint was addressed to him saw that the workers were dismissed and refused permits to seek work elsewhere. In desperation, it was alleged, they went on strike in July 1961; 600 were arrested but only two were subsequently charged and, after spending three weeks in gaol, were fined £20 each. When S.A.C.T.U. made representations on behalf of these workers to the Minister of Bantu Affairs, it was alleged, they were referred to the same Commissioner against whom the workers had complained.

135. S.A.C.T.U. alleged that 193 African workers employed by the Bay Transport Company, Port Elizabeth, were each fined £7 10s. for striking.

136. At its meeting in February 1963 the Committee decided to request the Government to furnish its observations on these allegations. The Government has not replied to repeated requests to furnish these observations.

137. The Committee has always applied the principle that allegations respecting the right to strike are not outside its competence in so far as they affect the exercise of trade union rights.[1] It has also pointed out that the right of workers and their organisations to strike as a legitimate means of defending their occupational interests is generally recognised.[2]

138. When the Committee examined the question of the right to strike of African workers in an earlier case relating to the then Union of South Africa, it observed that, while temporary restrictions were placed on the right to strike of employees covered by the Industrial Conciliation Act, and a complete prohibition was placed on strikes by such employees engaged in certain essential services, section 18 (1) of the Native Labour (Settlement of Disputes) Act, 1953, placed a total prohibition on strikes by African workers, irrespective of the nature of their occupation.[3] On that occasion the Committee expressed the view that, where the right to strike was accorded to workers and their organisations, there should be no racial discrimination with respect to those to whom it was accorded.[4] Accordingly, in that case, the Committee recommended the Governing Body to note that in South Africa the existence of racial discrimination in respect of trade union rights was further confirmed by the fact that the nature and extent of the limitations placed on the right to strike differed widely as between employees covered by the Industrial Conciliation Act and African workers.[5]

139. In these circumstances the Committee recommends the Governing Body—

(a) to draw the attention of the Government to the fact that the right of workers and their organisations to strike as a legitimate means of defending their occupational interests is generally recognised;

(b) to express its view that, where the right to strike is accorded to workers and their organisations, there should be no racial discrimination with respect to those to whom it is accorded;

(c) to note once again that in the Republic of South Africa the existence of racial discrimination in respect of trade union rights is further confirmed by the fact that the nature and extent of the limitations placed on the right to strike differ widely as between employees covered by the Industrial Conciliation Act, 1956, and African workers.

Allegations relating to Anti-Union Propaganda Carried On by Government Departments

140. In its communication dated 12 May 1962 S.A.C.T.U. alleged that anti-union propaganda was carried on among its 99,800 African employees by the South African Railways and Harbours Administration, which was a government department.

141. The complainant furnished a purported extract from the March 1962 issue of Umqondiso, an official publication of the Administration circulated among non-white railway workers. In the extract as furnished it was stated:

The workers' representatives and the regional committees (appointed by the Administration) are the official medium for the purpose of making representations to the Department. They are, in fact, the only medium which are recognised by the Department.... On the other hand, there are organisations and so-called unions who influence non-European servants to join up and become a member of the organisation. The fees are high and are privately collected every month. They make it look legal by issuing a membership card and a receipt.... These so-called unions do not enjoy departmental recognition and the management of the railways or any of its officials do not, in any manner or form, on whatever subject, negotiate with these unions. They cannot assist you in any of your service conditions; yes, they are only out to collect your money. They are living off the fat of the land, and that with your hard-earned money which you contribute to them monthly. As a matter of fact, activities related to these unions, of whatever nature they may be, are not permitted on railway premises.

142. After referring to these organisations as " illegal so-called unions ", the extract stated as follows:

To protect you from these unscrupulous people, the Administration has given strict instructions that no non-European servant may act as a collector for societies, firms, unions, associations or any other organisation or cause, without the written permission of the Head of Department. Nor is any person allowed to enter railway premises to collect any money from railway servants whether it be during working hours or not. Let this be a warning to you and do not allow others to mislead you.

143. In the view of the complainants these statements defamed officials of the South African Railways and Harbour Workers' Union (of African railway workers), stated wrongly that the union was illegal and confirmed the implacable opposition of the Government to free trade union organisation.

144. At its meeting in February 1963 the Committee decided to request the Government to furnish its observations on these allegations. It has failed to reply to repeated requests to do so.

145. It appears clear from the text of an official publication cited by the complainants that the South African Railways and Harbours Administration exercised pressure on non-white railway workers to induce them not to join trade unions. The references to the fact that the unions seeking to organise the workers in question do not enjoy departmental recognition and are not allowed to negotiate and the statement that " the workers' representatives and the regional committees (appointed by the Administration) are the official medium for the purpose of making representations to the Department " and that these are, in fact, " the only medium ", are particularly significant.

146. In these circumstances the Committee recommends the Governing Body—

(a) to emphasise the importance which it attaches to the generally accepted principle that workers without distinction whatsoever should have the right to establish and join organisations of their own choosing without previous authorisation;

(b) to draw the attention of the Government to its view that the extract from the March 1962 issue of Umqondiso cited by the complainants and set forth in paragraphs 141 and 142 above constituted an infringement of this principle on the part of the South African Railways and Harbours Administration.

Allegations relating to Police Interference with the Trade Union Activities of the Johannesburg Branch Secretary of the National Union of Laundering, Cleaning and Dyeing Workers

147. In a communication dated 11 January 1964 S.A.C.T.U. complained of the treatment accorded by officers of the Special Branch to Mr. E. Davoren, Johannesburg Branch Secretary of the National Union of Laundering, Cleaning and Dyeing Workers.

148. According to the copy of an affidavit by Mr. Davoren forwarded by the complainant, he was, in December 1963, engaged in assisting in negotiations regarding a new wage agreement. In this connection it was his duty to keep the workers informed of the course of the negotiations and to consult them on their case. Accordingly, he addressed a meeting of workers at Lorentzville on 19 December 1963 and distributed pamphlets setting out their case for a minimum £1 a day. After leaving the meeting he was intercepted by officers of the Special Branch, who took him to headquarters. There, fearing to share the fate of 35 other union officials detained without charge, he asked to use a telephone in order to tell a trade union colleague where he was, but the officer snatched the instrument from his hand. He alleged that the officer lost all self-control and threatened to " tear him apart ". He was then made to sit in the centre of a room occupied by several officers. The senior officer present produced a copy of the pamphlet he had distributed and told him that he was sure to get 90 days and that " it was the Communist cell in S.A.C.T.U. which started the campaign for £1 per day ". He was then questioned as to his earnings in South Africa and concerning his work and earnings in England. In the end, he alleged, after insulting him repeatedly, they allowed him to leave.

149. In a communication dated 11 February 1964 S.A.C.T.U. alleged that Mr. Davoren had been detained and was to be deported to England.

150. In its communication dated 13 February 1964 W.F.T.U. formulated similar complaints regarding Mr. Davoren.

151. In a communication dated 26 April 1964 S.A.C.T.U. stated that Mr. Davoren had been deported in March 1964.

152. In a number of cases the Committee has emphasised the importance that it has always attached to the fact that the right to bargain freely with employers with respect to conditions of work constitutes an essential element in freedom of association [1], and to the principle [2] that trade unions should have the right, through collective bargaining or other lawful means, to seek to improve the living and working conditions of those whom the trade unions represent, and that the public authorities should refrain from any interference which would restrict this right or impede the lawful exercise thereof. The Committee has stated further that any such interference, by the same token, would appear to infringe the generally accepted principle that workers' organisations should have the right, without such interference, to organise their activities and to formulate their programmes.[3]

153. It appears from the detailed evidence furnished by the complainants, to which the Government has made no reply, that Mr. E. Davoren, Johannesburg Branch Secretary of the National Union of Laundering, Cleaning and Dyeing Workers, was engaged in lawful wage negotiations on behalf of his members in December 1962, when, by reason of the fact that he was engaged in such negotiations, he was questioned, his actions were criticised and he was threatened with 90 days' detention by officers of the Special Branch.

154. In these circumstances the Committee recommends the Governing Body to draw the attention of the Government to the importance which it attaches to the principles enunciated in paragraph 152 above and to its view that the action taken by the police with regard to Mr. Davoren on 19 December 1962 constituted an infringement of the said principles.

Allegations relating to Interference in the Activities of the Food and Canning Workers' Union (Cape Town)

155. In its communications dated 7 November 1962 and 5 February and 1 March 1963 the Food and Canning Workers' Union (Cape Town) alleged various acts of interference in its activities by the authorities.

156. The complainants stated that their union was registered under the Industrial Conciliation Act and had 8,600 members and 27 branches.

157. On 10 May 1962 the General Secretary and four other representatives of the union visited Mossel Bay. These five officials were alleged to have been arrested at 1.30 p.m. and detained for four hours. The complainants stated that the five were arrested in their car which was on a property next to that of the undertaking they intended to visit; despite this, it was alleged, the police urged the employers to lay a charge of trespassing against them.

158. When five union officials, including its President, Vice-President and General Secretary, visited the fishing village of Stompneus Bay on 17 June 1962, it was alleged, they were questioned by the police, who also asked the employers not to allow the union to hold meetings.

159. Four union officials, including the President, Vice-President and General Secretary, visited East London on 4 July 1962. The complainants stated that they were stopped by the police and taken to the charge-house to be questioned by Mr. Huttingh of the Special Branch, where they were kept for three hours, after which they were followed everywhere by the Special Branch. Mr. Huttingh, it was alleged, told the union officials that when they went to East London in future " he should be approached first so that he could work together with them " and added, when they refused this, " that he would break down everything they built up in East London ".

160. It was alleged that the Special Branch attended factory meetings of the union's Paarl Branch. On 5 July 1962 six Special Branch men attended a meeting of the East London branch and refused to leave. Between 15 and 27 July 1962 branch officials and members received visits from the Special Branch; at the same time the police put pressure on employers who had thus far co-operated with the union and allowed it to hold meetings on factory premises. On 18 February 1963 union officials visited Mossel Bay; the union lunch-hour meeting on factory premises was attended by the police; on 19 February the firm concerned would not permit a further meeting. A members' meeting was held at the Mossel Bay Roman Catholic Church Hall but the priest in charge was visited by the police and then asked the participants to leave. A lunch-hour meeting organised by the Montagu branch of the union on 21 February 1963 was attended by members of the Special Branch.

161. The Government has failed to reply to repeated requests made to it to furnish its observations on these allegations.

162. The Committee has consistently drawn attention [1] to the importance it has always attached to the fact that freedom from government interference in the holding of proceedings of trade union meetings constitutes an essential element of trade union rights, as well as to the principle that the public authorities should refrain from any interference which would restrict this right or impede the lawful exercise thereof.

163. It appears from the evidence furnished by the complainants that on different occasions at Paarl, Mossel Bay and Montagu, as indicated in paragraph 160 above, the police attended trade union meetings organised by the union. The Committee, in the absence of any explanations by the Government, can only conclude that these facts constitute an infringement of the principle enunciated in the preceding paragraph.

164. The complainants have also furnished evidence to the effect that officers of their union, when visiting Mossel Bay, East London and Paarl, were questioned or detained and threatened by the police in respect of their trade union activities. In the view of the Committee these acts constituted an infringement of the right of a workers' organisation to organise its activities without interference on the part of the public authorities.

165. The Committee therefore recommends the Governing Body—

(a) to draw the attention of the Government to the importance which it has always attached to the fact that freedom from government interference in the holding or proceedings of trade union meetings constitutes an essential element of trade union rights, to the principle that the public authorities should refrain from any interference which would restrict this right or impede the lawful exercise thereof, and to the principle that workers' organisations should have the right to organise their activities without interference on the part of the public authorities;

(b) to express its view that the various instances of police interference cited by the complainants, as indicated in paragraphs 157 to 160 above, constituted infringements of the principles and rights enunciated in the preceding subparagraph.

* * *

166. In all the circumstances the Committee recommends the Governing Body—

(a) with regard to the allegations relating to the provisions concerning sabotage in the General Law Amendment Act, 1962—

(i) to deplore the fact that the Government of the Republic of South Africa has failed to furnish the further information requested of it, as indicated in paragraph 234 (a) of the 68th Report of the Committee cited in paragraph 75 above, on repeated occasions, or to reply to the several requests made to it to furnish observations on the grave cases of prosecution of trade unionists for sabotage—in three of which cases sentence of death was pronounced—referred to in paragraphs 79 and 80 above;

(ii) to point out in these circumstances that the Government has failed to refute the allegations that trade union officers and members are liable to be prosecuted for sabotage and sentenced to death under the General Law Amendment Act, 1962, in the event of their having performed any of the trade union activities indicated in paragraph 74 above;

(iii) to point out to the Government that, by virtue of the fact that strike action by African workers is always unlawful under the Native Labour (Settlement of Disputes) Act, 1953, and therefore wrongful under section 21 of the General Law Amendment Act, 1962, whereas strike action by other workers is not wrongful in this sense when it is not unlawful in terms of the Industrial Conciliation Act, 1956, or the Railways and Harbours Service Act, 1960, the provisions of section 21 are discriminatory against a particular race;

(iv) to point out to the Government that, in the case of other races, these provisions are discriminatory against the officers and members of non-registered organisations;

(v) to reaffirm its previous statement of its view that the provisions of section 21 (2) of the General Law Amendment Act, 1962, are inconsistent with generally accepted principles relating to freedom of association;

(b) with regard to the allegations relating to measures taken against trade union leaders and members under the Suppression of Communism Act and the General Law Amendment Act—

(i) to draw the attention of the Government to the importance which the Governing Body attaches to the principle that the public authorities should refrain from any interference which would restrict the right of occupational organisations to elect their representatives in full freedom and to organise their administration and activities;

(ii) to express the view that the provisions of the Suppression of Communism Act and the General Law Amendment Act which permit the Minister in his discretion to remove trade union leaders from trade union office and to disqualify them for such office in the future are incompatible with this generally accepted principle and have been consistently applied in practice in a manner incompatible with the said principle;

(iii) to draw the attention of the Government to the fact that in all cases in which trade union leaders are preventively detained these measures may involve a serious interference with the exercise of trade union rights and to the importance which the Governing Body attaches to the right of all detained persons to receive a fair trial at the earliest possible moment;

(iv) to express its view that the restriction of a person's movements to a limited area accompanied by a prohibition of entry into the area in which his trade union operates and in which he normally carries on his trade union functions is also inconsistent with the normal enjoyment of the right of association and with the exercise of the right to carry on trade union activities and functions, and should also be accompanied by adequate judicial safeguards applied within a reasonable period and, especially, by observance of the right of those concerned to receive a fair trial at the earliest possible moment;

(v) to draw the attention of the Government to its view that the provisions of the Suppression of Communism Act and the General Law Amendment Act which permit the Minister in his discretion to confine trade union leaders to a particular area, to prohibit them from entering the areas in which they normally carry on their trade union activities and to hold them in solitary confinement for a 90 days' period which can be renewed, without trial and even without charges being laid, are incompatible with the right to exercise trade union activities and functions and with the principle of fair trial enunciated above and have consistently been applied in a manner incompatible with the said right and the said principle;

(c) with regard to the allegations relating to the suppression of and restrictions on newspapers pursuant to the Suppression of Communism Act, the General Law Amendment Act and the Publications and Entertainments Bill—

(i) to reaffirm its view that the right to express opinions through the press is clearly one of the essential elements of trade union rights;

(ii) to express the view that if, as alleged, trade union newspapers are required to furnish a £10,000 bond, this would constitute, especially in the case of smaller unions, such an unreasonable condition for their existence as to be incompatible with the exercise of the foregoing right;

(iii) to express further its view that, if the provisions of the Publications and Entertainments Bill concerning " undesirable literature " have been or were to be enacted in the terms alleged, this would permit of such abusive interpretation in the discretion of the authorities as to be incompatible with the right of trade unions to express opinions through the press;

(d) with regard to the allegations relating to the banning of organisations under the General Law Amendment Act, to draw the attention of the Government to its view that the provisions in question, which appear to permit the competent authorities to ban any organisation which carries on any normally legal trade union activity if that activity has at any time figured in the programme of any trade union or other organisation which has been declared to be unlawful, are incompatible with the generally accepted principle that the public authorities should refrain from any interference which would restrict the right of workers' organisations to organise their activities and to formulate their programmes or impede the lawful exercise of this right;

(e) with regard to the conviction of Mr. Gaitsewe, Acting General Secretary of the South African Congress of Trade Unions, on a charge of illegally leaving the country contrary to the provisions of the Departure from the Union Regulation Act, to draw the attention of the Government to the importance which the Governing Body attaches to the right of national trade union organisations to affiliate with international organisations of workers and to its view that this right normally carries with it the right of representatives of national organisations to maintain contact with the international organisations with which they are affiliated and to take part in the work of those organisations;

(f) with regard to the allegations relating to the prohibition of strikes by African workers—

(i) to draw the attention of the Government to the fact that the right of workers and their organisations to strike as a legitimate means of defending their occupational interests is generally recognised;

(ii) to express its view that, where the right to strike is accorded to workers and their organisations, there should be no racial discrimination with respect to those to whom it is accorded;

(iii) to note once again that in the Republic of South Africa the existence of racial discrimination in respect of trade union rights is further confirmed by the fact that the nature and extent of the limitations placed on the right to strike differ widely as between employees covered by the Industrial Conciliation Act, 1956, and African workers;

(g) with regard to the allegations relating to anti-union propaganda carried on by government departments—

(i) to emphasise the importance which it attaches to the generally accepted principle that workers without distinction whatsoever should have the right to establish and join organisations of their own choosing without previous authorisation;

(ii) to draw the attention of the Government to its view that the extract from the March 1962 issue of Umqondiso cited by the complainants and set forth in paragraphs 141 and 142 above constituted an infringement of this principle on the part of the South African Railways and Harbours Administration;

(h) with regard to the allegations relating to police interference with the trade union activities of Mr. E. Davoren, Johannesburg Branch Secretary of the National Union of Laundering, Cleaning and Dyeing Workers—

(i) to emphasise the importance which it has always attached to the fact that the right to bargain freely with employers with respect to conditions of work constitutes an essential element in freedom of association, and to the principle that trade unions should have the right, through collective bargaining or other lawful means, to seek to improve the living and working conditions of those whom the trade unions represent, and that the public authorities should refrain from any interference which would restrict this right or impede the lawful exercise thereof;

(ii) to express its view that the action taken by the police with regard to Mr. Davoren on 19 December 1962 constituted an infringement of the principle enunciated in the preceding clause and also of the principle that workers' organisations should have the right, without interference on the part of the public authorities, to organise their activities and formulate their programmes;

(i) to note that, for the reasons indicated in paragraph 113 above, the evidence before the Committee does not enable it to reach firm conclusions on the allegations relating to measures taken against trade unionists under the Trespass Act and Urban Area Act and legislation restricting entry into reserves;

(j) with regard to the allegations relating to interference in the activities of the Food and Canning Workers' Union (Cape Town);

(i) to draw the attention of the Government to the importance which it has always attached to the fact that freedom from government interference in the holding or proceedings of trade union meetings constitutes an essential element of trade union rights, to the principle that the public authorities should refrain from any interference which would restrict this right or impede the lawful exercise thereof, and to the principle that workers' organisations should have the right to organise their activities without interference on the part of the public authorities;

(ii) to express its view that the various instances of police interference cited by the complainants, as indicated in paragraphs 157 to 160 above, constituted infringements of the principles and rights enunciated in the preceding subparagraph.

Case No. 341 :

Complaint Presented by the Pan-Hellenic Federation of Textile Workers against the Government of Greece

167. This case was examined by the Committee at its 36th Session, held in Geneva in February 1964. At that time the Committee submitted to the Governing Body an interim report setting forth its final conclusions in respect of some of the allegations in the case, whilst as regards others it recommended the Governing Body to seek additional information from the Government. These conclusions and recommendations, contained in the Committee's 75th Report[1], were adopted by the Governing Body at its 159th Session, on 10 July 1964.

168. The paragraphs which follow deal only with the allegations which remain outstanding. These allegations relate to—

(a) infringements of the right of collective bargaining;

(b) governmental interference in connection with collective agreements; and

(c) the composition of arbitration tribunals.[2]

169. Greece has ratified both the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), and the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98).

Allegations relating to Infringements of the Right of Collective Bargaining

170. The allegations made in this respect by the complainants and the Government's observations thereon were analysed in detail in paragraphs 47 to 71 of the Committee's 75th Report. It will therefore suffice to recall briefly below the outlines of this aspect of the case.

171. These revealed that there were two trade union organisations claiming to represent the workers in the textile industry: on the one hand, the complaining organisation—the Pan-Hellenic Federation of Textile Workers—and, on the other hand, the Federation of Greek Textile Workers. According to the complainants the latter organisation had only about 1,000 members, whereas they themselves had a membership of 12,000.

[1] See paras. 42-107.

[2] See 75th Report, paras. 47-71 and 107 (b), 75-79 and 107 (c), and 83-87 and 107 (d), respectively.

172. It may also be seen from the information available to the Committee at that time that both the trade union organisations in question were " representative " of the workers concerned, a decision of the competent judge dated 6 November 1962 having recognised both the complaining organisation and the Federation of Greek Textile Workers as representative organisations.

173. Having begun negotiations with the employers with a view to the revision of the collective agreement in force, each of the two organisations submitted a different set of claims. Those submitted by the complaining organisation were rejected by the employers. Those put forward by the Federation of Greek Textile Workers, on the other hand, were acceded to by the employers, who concluded with that organisation a new collective agreement which was approved by the Minister of Labour.

174. The complaining organisation, claiming that it had been thrust on one side, thereupon requested the Minister of Labour to submit the case to an arbitration tribunal. The Minister refused to do so, justifying his refusal by the argument that having approved one collective agreement he could not approve another.

175. In order to settle the matter both the organisations concerned appealed to the Council of State. Faithful to its invariable practice, the Committee recommended the Governing Body at its February 1964 Session to request the Government to supply the text of the Council of State's decision as soon as it was pronounced.

176. With its reply dated 27 July 1965 the Government furnishes the text of the Council of State's decision, together with that of a decision of the first-instance arbitration tribunal of Piraeus as to the representative capacity of the two organisations concerned.

177. The Council of State noted that by its decision of 1962 (see paragraph 172 above) the first-instance arbitration tribunal of Athens had ruled that both the organisations involved were representative. The Council of State went on to say, however, that the arbitration tribunal was not empowered to take such a decision, its task being to determine which of the two organisations was the more representative and thereby qualified to represent the workers in the trade in collective negotiations. It therefore annulled the decision.

178. The question of the representative capacity of the two organisations concerned was then brought before the first-instance arbitration tribunal of Piraeus, which, at a public hearing on 16 July 1964, decided on the basis of the evidence submitted to it that the Federation of Greek Textile Workers, with its 17 affiliated unions representing a total of 30,043 members, was the more representative of the trade, the Pan-Hellenic Federation of Textile Workers being composed of only 11 unions with a total of 21,040 members.

179. The above-mentioned observations of the arbitration tribunal of Piraeus show that, contrary to the allegations made by the complaining organisation (see paragraph 171 above), that organisation is not the most representative of the textile workers. Moreover, since it is clear from the Council of State's decision that only the organisation the most representative of the textile workers is qualified to negotiate collective agreements, the Committee considers that the complaining organisation has not furnished sufficient proof in support of its allegations, and it therefore recommends the Governing Body to decide that this aspect of the case does not call for further examination.

Allegations relating to Governmental Interference in connection with Collective Agreements

180. The complainants alleged that the validity of collective agreements was decided at the discretion of the Ministers of Labour and Co-ordination, which, they said, were empowered to modify the terms of such agreements.

181. At its February 1964 Session the Committee noted that under section 20 (2) of Act No. 3239 of 1955, in fact, " in the event of any collective agreement . . . being contrary to the general economic or social policy of the Government, or to any such policy in particular matters, the Ministers of Co-ordination and of Labour may ... amend or withhold approval of all or part of such agreement ... by means of a joint order (with reasons) ...".

182. In its observations the Government pointed out that this provision of the law, dating from 1955, had been introduced to meet the urgent need that existed at the time to ensure the economic and financial stability of the country. As the situation had greatly changed meanwhile, it had been decided to amend the law in this respect, and a Bill for this purpose had been laid before Parliament, but, continued the Government, the Bill had not been passed owing to a change of government.

183. At its February 1964 Session the Committee took the view that before examining further this aspect of the case it would be advisable to ascertain the Government's intentions concerning the amendments to the legislation that had been contemplated by its predecessor. For this reason it recommended the Governing Body to request the Government to be good enough to inform it whether it intended to alter the section of Act No. 3239 referred to above and, if so, to specify the nature of the alterations contemplated or made.

184. In its reply the Government states that the draft Bill for the Labour Code, the text of which has already been submitted to the I.L.O., provides for a new system of collective bargaining and arbitration, and amends several provisions of Act No. 3239.

185. If reference is made to the text of the draft Bill, it would appear that under section 327, paragraph 2, the Minister of Labour is empowered, in certain circumstances which are not specified, to refuse to allow a collective agreement to be filed.

186. The Committee considers that if such a refusal may be based on grounds only of errors of pure form the provision in question is not in conflict with the principle of voluntary negotiation laid down by the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), ratified by Greece. The Committee feels, on the other hand, that if this provision implies that the filing of a collective agreement may be refused on grounds such as those set forth in section 20 of Act No. 3239, as quoted in paragraph 181 above, it amounts to a requirement that prior approval be obtained before a collective agreement can come into force, which infringes the principle of voluntary negotiation laid down by the aforementioned Convention. In this connection the Committee feels compelled, as on a number of occasions in the past[1], to emphasise the importance that should be attached to the principle that the public authorities should refrain from any interference which would restrict the right of trade unions to seek, through collective bargaining or other lawful means, to improve the living and working conditions of those whom they represent, or impede the lawful exercise of this right.

187. Having said this, the Committee considers none the less that its objections to the requirement that prior approval of collective agreements be obtained from the Government do not signify that ways could not be found of persuading the parties to collective bargaining to have regard voluntarily in their negotiations to considerations relating to the economic or social policy of the Government and the safeguarding of the general interest. But to achieve this it is necessary first of all that the objectives to be recognised as being in the general interest should have been widely discussed by all parties on a national scale through a consultative body such as the National Social Policy Advisory Board, in accordance with the principle laid down by the Consultation (Industrial and National Levels) Recommendation,

[1] See Third Report, Case No. 1 (Peru), para. 20; Sixth Report, Case No. 12 (Argentina), paras. 237-240, and Case No. 55 (Greece), para. 923; 11th Report, Case No. 51 (Saar), para. 55; 13th Report, Case No. 62 (Cuba), para. 83; 15th Report, Case No. 102 (Union of South Africa), para. 164; 25th Report, Case No. 151 (Dominican Republic), para. 312; 27th Report, Case No. 143 (Spain), para. 169; 30th Report, Case No. 143 (Spain), para. 124; 52nd Report, Case No. 202 (Thailand), para. 158; 65th Report, Case No. 266 (Portugal), para. 65.

1960 (No. 113). It might also be possible to envisage a procedure whereby the attention of the parties could be drawn, in certain cases, to the considerations of general interest which might call for further examination of the terms of agreement on their part. However, in this connection, persuasion is always to be preferred to constraint. Thus, instead of making the validity of collective agreements subject to governmental approval, it might be provided that every collective agreement filed with the Ministry of Labour would normally come into force a reasonable length of time after being filed; if the public authority considered that the terms of the proposed agreement were manifestly in conflict with the economic policy objectives recognised as being desirable in the general interest, the case could be submitted for advice and recommendation to an appropriate consultative body, it being understood, however, that the final decision in the matter rested with the parties to the agreement.

188. Since the Government is in the process of revising its legislation on the subject, the Committee hopes that the foregoing observations and suggestions will be taken into account, and therefore recommends the Governing Body to draw the Government's attention thereto.

Allegations relating to the Composition of Arbitration Tribunals

189. The complainants alleged that Act No. 3239 provided for compulsory arbitration by tribunals without allowing the organisations concerned to appoint their representatives to them, since the workers' representatives were chosen by the Minister of Labour from among representatives nominated exclusively by the General Confederation of Greek Workers (C.G.T.).

190. In its reply the Government stated that workers' representatives on arbitration tribunals were not chosen by the authorities from a list of persons nominated by C.G.T. but appointed directly by that organisation, under section 10 (1) of Act No. 3239, as the most representative organisation of the workers.

191. At its February 1964 Session the Committee observed that while the workers' representatives on arbitration tribunals were not appointed by the Government on the proposal of C.G.T., but directly by that organisation, it was none the less true that, by the Act itself, it was for this organisation alone to decide who should be the workers' representatives on arbitration tribunals. But it was common knowledge, went on the Committee, that side by side with C.G.T. there were other workers' federations in Greece. Without wishing to cast any doubt on the representative character of C.G.T., the Committee considered that it would be better able to form an informed opinion if it possessed precise information on the numerical strength and the representative character of the various main trade union organisations in Greece. It therefore recommended the Governing Body to request this information from the Government.

192. In its reply the Government makes no allusion to this aspect of the case. If one refers to the draft Bill for the Labour Code of which mention was made earlier, however, it will be seen that section 356 embodies the concept that the most representative unions should provide members for the National Arbitration Board. It will also be seen, however, that there is no provision in the draft Bill going into more detail on this point, and that section 356 leaves it to the discretion of the Minister of Labour to decide which employers' and workers' organisations are to be considered the most representative.

193. The Committee considers that in such circumstances it is important that the State should not intervene other than to give formal recognition to an existing situation, and that in assessing that existing situation—i.e. in determining whether an organisation is representative—it is indispensable that any decision should be based on objective criteria laid down in advance by an independent body, and founded in their turn on grounds which allow for no possibility of abuse.

194. Here again, for the same reason as given in paragraph 188 above, the Committee recommends the Governing Body to draw the Government's attention to the observations contained in the preceding paragraph.

195. As regards the case as a whole the Committee recommends the Governing Body—

(a) to decide, for the reasons indicated in paragraph 179 above, that the allegations relating to infringements of the right of collective bargaining do not call for further examination;

(b) with respect to the allegations relating to governmental interference in connection with collective agreements, to draw the Government's attention to the observations and suggestions contained in paragraphs 186 and 187 above;

(c) with respect to the allegations relating to the composition of arbitration tribunals, to draw the Government's attention to its view that, in determining whether an organisation is representative for the purpose of participation in the membership of such tribunals, it is important that the State should not intervene other than to give formal recognition to an existing situation, and that it is indispensable that any decision should be based on objective criteria laid down in advance by an independent body, and founded in their turn on grounds which allow for no possibility of abuse.

Case No. 406:

Complaint Presented by the British Guiana Trades Union Council against the Government of the United Kingdom in respect of British Guiana

196. The complaint of the British Guiana Trades Union Council was addressed directly to the I.L.O. on 3 July 1964. On 29 July 1964 the Secretary-General of the United Nations transmitted to the I.L.O. a copy of the complaint which had been addressed to him on 21 July 1964 by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions. Observations on the complaint were furnished by the Government of the United Kingdom by a communication dated 15 January 1965. The foregoing documents were before the Committee at its meeting in May 1965, when the Committee submitted an interim report to the Governing Body in paragraphs 305 to 323 of its 83rd Report, which was approved by the Governing Body on 28 May 1965, in the course of its 162nd Session.

197. The Government of the United Kingdom has ratified the Right of Association (Agriculture) Convention, 1921 (No. 11), the Right of Association (Non-Metropolitan Territories) Convention, 1947 (No. 84), and the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), and has declared their provisions to be applicable, without modification, to British Guiana. The Government of the United Kingdom has also ratified the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), and has declared it applicable to British Guiana with modifications.

198. The complaint relates to events alleged to have taken place in British Guiana prior to the election of the present Government in December 1964 and is directed against the former Government, in which the People's Progressive Party (P.P.P.) held power, the Progressive Youth Organisation (P.Y.O.) connected with that party, and what the complainant refers to as the " government and party sponsored and financed trade union, known as the Guiana Agricultural Workers' Union (G.A.W.U.) ". According to the allegations, the G.A.W.U. President, Mr. Harry Lall, was a P.P.P. member of the Legislative Assembly; he was detained by the Governor on 13 June 1964, since which date Mr. Macie Hamid, another P.P.P. legislator but not a member of G.A.W.U., had acted as its President, while another non-union member, Mr. George Henry, who was removed from the legislature by the courts, became its Vice-President.

199. The allegations were analysed in full in paragraphs 308 to 316 of the Committee's 83rd Report. They may be more briefly summarised as follows. Since a stoppage of work began at Leonora estate on 17 February 1964, Ministers and members of the former Government, P.P.P., P.Y.O. and G.A.W.U. are alleged to have waged a campaign of terror against sugar workers belonging to the Man-Power Citizens' Association (M.P.C.A.) affiliated to the complaining organisation, in order to prevent them working, 24 workers being murdered and many injured and 134 workers' houses being burnt and 540 more destroyed or seriously damaged. All these events were said to have flowed from the fact that G.A.W.U., backed by the former Government, called a series of strikes in order to force the sugar employers to recognise them as bargaining agent instead of M.P.C.A., which had a majority membership. At one stage 4,000 workers were terrorised into leaving M.P.C.A. but 3,000 of them rejoined, whereupon the former Government is alleged to have embarked on a plan to destroy factories and sugar crops and enforce work stoppages, so that protection had to be given by United Kingdom troops. The complainants describe the various methods employed by the agitators. From 19 February 1964 onwards, the four unions (including M.P.C.A.) having bargaining agreements with the Sugar Producers' Association, as well as the Chamber of Commerce, pressed the Governor to bring in United Kingdom troops and demanded the issue of emergency regulations, a course which the former Minister of Home Affairs, Mrs. Jagan, refused to adopt until 22 May 1964. On 16 May 1964 a commission of inquiry had been set up but, as it consisted of P.P.P. sympathisers, the complainants challenged it in the courts and it adjourned sine die. On 13 June 1964 the Governor assumed emergency powers.

200. In a communication dated 15 January 1965 the Government of the United Kingdom stated that a new government had been formed in British Guiana following elections in December 1964 and that the Ministers mentioned in the allegations were no longer in office. The new Government in British Guiana, regretting the failure of the previous Government to furnish observations, said that it could not itself offer satisfactory comments without a detailed investigation, which would not, in view of the lapse of time, produce conclusive evidence, but that it intended to promote the implementation of the applicable provisions of the Conventions relating to freedom of association.

201. At its meeting in May 1965 the Committee recalled that in earlier cases[1] it has taken the view, when it has had before it allegations relating to violations of trade union rights by an earlier government, that, although the government in power could obviously not be held responsible for events which took place under its predecessor, it is clearly responsible for any continuing consequences which they may have had since its accession to power.

202. The Committee observed that, in the absence of any observations on the merits of the matters alleged, it was not possible for it to say whether such continuing consequences of the events alleged still existed. For example, it was still unaware of the relative positions and relationships of M.P.C.A. and G.A.W.U. and the Sugar Producers' Association; it did not know what might have ensued from the setting up of a commission of inquiry by the previous Government; and it did not know, in the event of the allegations being well founded, what steps, if any, the present Government might have taken or intended to take to indemnify the dependants of M.P.C.A. members stated to have been murdered because they refused to join a strike encouraged by the previous Government itself or to indemnify workers whose homes were destroyed. The Committee recalled that, in Case No. 260 relating to Iraq, where the observations of the Government concerned had been insufficient for the Committee to be able to decide whether events occurring under a previous government had continued to have consequences under a successor government, the Committee had requested the Government concerned to furnish fuller observations before it formulated its conclusions to the Governing Body.[2]

[2] See 72nd Report, para. 78.

203. Further, having before it information to the effect that two members of G.A.W.U. had been charged with offences of sedition committed on 7 March and 2 April 1964, the Committee took the view that the judgments of the courts inquiring into these incidents might afford information as to the general situation then existing which would be of assistance to the Committee in formulating its conclusions.[1]

204. In these circumstances the Committee, in paragraph 323 of its 83rd Report, recommended the Governing Body to request the Government to be good enough to furnish fuller observations on the matters alleged in the complaint and also to furnish copies of the judgments given in the proceedings against the two members of G.A.W.U. referred to above.

205. These recommendations were approved by the Governing Body on 28 May 1965, in the course of its 162nd Session, and the request for further observations and information was conveyed to the Government of the United Kingdom by a letter dated 3 June 1965. The Government furnished further information by a communication dated 11 October 1965 enclosing observations prepared by the present Government of British Guiana.

206. The Government of British Guiana states once again that it would not be possible to offer satisfactory comments on the individual matters referred to in the complaint by the British Guiana T.U.C. without a detailed investigation which would not, in view of the lapse of time, produce conclusive evidence. It says that it is not aware of any continuing consequences and wishes to state categorically that there has been no interference by the present Government with the operation of the trade union movement in the country contrary to the Right of Association (Agriculture) Convention, 1921 (No. 11), the Right of Association (Non-Metropolitan Territories) Convention, 1947 (No. 84), and the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), or to the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), as applied with modifications.

207. The present Government of British Guiana gives the following further information.

208. G.A.W.U. failed to gain recognition but instructed its members to return to work on 27 July 1964. On 24 August 1964 G.A.W.U. renewed its application for recognition because the registration of M.P.C.A. had been cancelled by the Registrar of Trade Unions on the ground that it had wilfully violated section 35 of the Trade Unions Ordinance. M.P.C.A. appealed to the court, which ruled, in September 1964, that the cancellation of registration had been " wrongful, mistaken, ultra vires and void ". On 19 September 1964 the Sugar Producers' Association informed G.A.W.U., accordingly, that its recognition of M.P.C.A. continued unchanged. On 27 February 1965 G.A.W.U. applied for recognition to two individual sugar companies, but they replied that questions of that kind could be dealt with only by the Sugar Producers' Association. G.A.W.U. made no further demand for recognition. It appears that over 50 per cent. of sugar industry employees are members of M.P.C.A.

209. The appointment of the commission of inquiry set up by the previous Government (see paragraph 199 above) was revoked by the Governor in February 1965, as advised by the present Government.

210. On the question of indemnification of those persons who had suffered during the disturbances which followed the strike, the present Government has appointed a Committee comprising 12 persons under the chairmanship of Sir Stanley Gomes, a retired Chief Justice, with the following terms of reference: " to examine generally the conditions of persons displaced and otherwise affected by the disturbances in 1962, 1963 and 1964, and to determine and advise to what extent such persons should be assisted to return to normal life ".

211. The two members of G.A.W.U. prosecuted for sedition were acquitted on 30 July 1965.

[1] See 83rd Report, para. 322.

212. It appears to the Committee from the wording of the particulars of the offences that copies of the proceedings might make available information of assistance to it in its examination of the factual allegations.

213. In these circumstances the Committee recommends the Governing Body—

(a) to note that the present Government of British Guiana has again stated through the Government of the United Kingdom that it could not comment satisfactorily on the individual matters referred to in the complaint without a detailed investigation which would not, in view of the lapse of time, produce conclusive evidence;

(b) to draw attention to the fact that allegations to the effect that, in the course of the strike called by G.A.W.U. and stated to have been backed by the previous Government of British Guiana, 24 non-strikers were murdered and many injured and 134 members' houses were burnt and 540 more were destroyed or seriously damaged have not been refuted either by the previous Government or the present Government of British Guiana;

(c) to note that the present Government of British Guiana has set up a committee whose terms of reference are to examine generally the conditions of persons displaced and otherwise affected by the distubances in 1962, 1963 and 1964 and to determine and advise to what extent such persons should be assisted to return to normal life;

(d) to express the hope that the question of indemnification of the persons affected, or their dependants, as the case may be, by the events referred to in subparagraph (b) above will be examined by the committee now set up by the present Government of British Guiana;

(e) to note that the cancellation of the registration of the Man-Power Citizens' Association during the term of office of the previous Government has now been set aside by the courts as having been " wrongful, mistaken, ultra vires and void " and that the union continues to be recognised by the British Guiana Sugar Producers' Association.

Case No. 411 :

Complaints Presented by the Latin American Confederation of Christian Trade Unionists and the International Federation of Christian Trade Unions against the Government of the Dominican Republic

214. The complaint of the Latin American Confederation of Christian Trade Unionists (C.L.A.S.C.) is contained in a communication dated 19 August 1964 and that of the International Federation of Christian Trade Unions in a communication dated 20 August 1964. On 25 August 1964 I.F.C.T.U. sent a new communication containing additional information. After these had been forwarded to it, the Government sent its replies on 16 November 1964 and 11 March 1965. The allegations before the Committee relate especially to the provisions of the existing legislation and to their application in practice.

215. The Dominican Republic has ratified the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), and the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98).

216. In its communication of 19 August 1964 C.L.A.S.C. reported that the Christian trade union leaders Jesús Caminero, Henry Molina, Porfirio Zarzuela, Rosendo López and others had been imprisoned on account of a general strike which had been declared. The I.F.C.T.U. communication of 20 August 1964 repeated this information and reported the arrest of the main leaders of the Autonomous Confederation of Christian Trade Unions (C.A.S.C.). In its additional information I.F.C.T.U. reported that Mr. Zarzuela had been sentenced to a term of imprisonment, that 40 leaders had been arrested and that the police had raided the premises of certain organisations.

217. In its communication of 16 November 1964 the Government reported that on being notified of the complaints lodged by these trade union organisations it had ordered an inquiry into the facts connected with the detention of the persons named. No final judgment had so far been given in the case, since the final hearing was not due to take place until 28 November 1964, and the Government promised to send the text of the judgment given. By its communication of 11 March 1965 the Government sent the text of the judgment of 25 August 1964, given against Messrs. Luis H. Molina Peña, José de Jesús Caminero, Felipe Alcántara Valdez, Juan B. Ramírez Bello and Rosendo López R. by the Fourth Criminal Chamber of the National District, together with the grounds therefor, the text of the judgment of 28 August 1964 given by the labour court, together with the grounds therefor, and a certificate to the effect that the persons sentenced on 25 August 1964 had brought an appeal against the judgment in question.

218. As is apparent from the text of the judgment given by the Criminal Chamber on 25 August 1964, when the authorities learned that a number of trade union leaders were inciting the workers to strike the matter was investigated and the leaders in question were officially charged with violating sections 103 and 106 of the Penal Code (incitement to commit a crime), Act No. 5915 respecting illegal strikes and Act No. 6132 respecting the expression and dissemination of opinions. On 25 August 1964 the judicial hearing took place and the parties attended to state their case. In the view of the court it appeared from the statements of the accused that they had promoted an unlawful strike, in violation of the Acts and provisions specified. Finally, in the operative part of the judgment, the accused were found guilty of violating Act No. 5915 respecting illegal strikes and sentenced to pay a fine, substantial extenuating circumstances being taken into consideration. Act No. 5915 provides that all strikes declared for political reasons or on the basis of mere solidarity with other workers, and strikes declared in violation of the provisions of section 374 of the Labour Code, are illegal.

219. The judgment given on 28 August 1964 by the labour court found that the strike in which the said persons participated had been declared in violation of the provisions of section 374 of the Labour Code. Under section 373 of that Code strikes declared in violation of section 374, which prescribes the procedures to be followed before a strike is declared, are illegal. According to information furnished by the Secretariat of State for Labour, none of the requirements prescribed in section 374 was satisfied. On 24 August 1964 the accused were summoned to the hearing held to determine whether the strike was legal, but failed to appear. Accordingly, and having regard to the precedents of fact and of law, the strike in which the Autonomous Confederation of Christian Trade Unions participated, inter alia, was declared illegal.

220. Section 374 of the Labour Code reads as follows:

Before any strike may be declared the workers concerned shall submit to the Secretariat of State for Labour a statement declaring—

(1) that the strike has as its object the settlement of an economic dispute or the improvement of working conditions;

(2) that the economic dispute in question has been submitted without success to administrative conciliation procedure and that the parties (or one of the parties) have not appointed arbitrators or have not notified the appointment of arbitrators within the given time in conformity with the provisions of section 636;

(3) that more than 60 per cent. of the employees of the undertaking or undertakings concerned have voted in favour of the strike;

(4) that the services affected by the proposed strike are not public services of permanent utility.

No strike may be declared until at least 15 days have elapsed after the date of the statement submitted by the representatives of the organisation to the Secretary of State for Labour containing the above points.

. . . . . .

Within 48 hours of the submission of the statement the said Secretariat of State shall notify the employer party of the statement, forwarding one of the copies of the statement.

221. The Committee notes that the case involves two aspects of the same problem, which derives fundamentally from the legislation in force in the Dominican Republic respecting collective disputes and strikes. One is the criminal aspect and the other is the purely industrial aspect, though both are closely related.

222. With regard to the industrial aspect the Committee points out that on a previous occasion it was called upon to examine the legislation of the Dominican Republic on collective labour disputes and the right to strike.[1] Notwithstanding certain amendments to that legislation, the Committee notes that the rules applied are basically the same. On that occasion the Committee had felt that the cumulative effect of the various provisions applicable in this matter, especially the provision that a trade union must, before declaring a strike, satisfy the government authorities of the economic character of the dispute, a provision which may well become indistinguishable in practice from a requirement of prior government authorisation, amounts to a denial of the right to strike, and for that reason recommended the Governing Body to draw the Government's attention to the desirability of its giving further consideration to the matter.[2]

223. On the other hand, with a view to stating still more clearly its observations on the relevant legislation, the Committee finds it necessary to point out that, under section 374 of the Labour Code, one of the requirements to be satisfied before a strike may be declared is that one of the parties to the dispute has not appointed arbitrators after the administrative conciliation procedure. In such event, according to section 636, the arbitrators may be nominated ex officio, i.e. a dispute may be taken to arbitration in any case. However, as section 377 seems to imply, a strike declared after the commencement of arbitration proceedings would be illegal. On the other hand, according to section 656, the award, once given, has the effect of a collective agreement and its application is compulsory. Taken together, these provisions may be interpreted as absolutely prohibiting the right to strike.

224. The Committee has always maintained the principle that allegations respecting the right to strike are within its competence in so far, but only in so far, as they affect the exercise of trade union rights [3] and has pointed out on a number of occasions [4] that workers and their organisations are usually granted the right to strike as a legitimate means of defending their occupational interests. In this connection the Committee has emphasised the importance it attaches, where strikes are prohibited or are subject to restrictions, in essential services, to the establishment of adequate safeguards to protect the interests of the workers, who are thus deprived of an essential means of defending their occupational interests [1], and has pointed out that such restrictions should be accompanied by adequate, impartial and speedy conciliation and arbitration procedures, in which the parties concerned may participate at every stage[2], and that the awards given should in all cases be binding on both parties. The Committee explained in this connection that these principles do not apply to the absolute restriction of the right to strike, but to the restriction of that right in the essential services or in the civil service, in which case adequate guarantees should be provided to safeguard the interests of the workers.[3]

225. The Committee observes that in a report sent by the Government of the Dominican Republic [4] on the application of Convention No. 87 it is stated that all the requirements and formalities which the Labour Code imposes on trade unions before a strike may be declared are purely for the information of the Secretariat of State for Labour, which allows them to use its good offices in an endeavour to achieve a settlement through conciliation, and that the requirements are never laid down with the idea that the Secretariat should come to any kind of decision as to whether the workers do in fact wish to strike or not, or as to the nature of the strike, such decisions falling exclusively within the competence of the labour courts. The Government adds that there has been no case where workers have been restricted in their freedom to determine whether or not to strike, although they have been notified on many occasions that they must follow the procedure laid down in the Labour Code if the strike is to be declared lawful.

226. The Committee feels that the legal provisions cited seem to admit of the interpretation that it is possible to prohibit the exercise of the right to strike in all cases by declaring a strike illegal, even though this is done by a court. It is also possible that the existence of seemingly contradictory provisions respecting the right to strike might give rise to uncertainty.

227. The Committee accordingly recommends the Governing Body to draw the Government's attention once again to the desirability of re-examining the provisions governing strikes in the light of the considerations set forth in paragraphs 224 and 226 above, so as to establish sufficiently simple and speedy procedures prior to a strike and thereby ensure that workers are not, in practice, deprived of one of the essential means at their disposal for furthering their demands.

228. With regard to the criminal aspect of this case the Committee notes that, under the legislation in force, persons found guilty of promoting an illegal strike are liable to imprisonment for a period between 15 days and six months, as prescribed in Act No. 5915. In this connection the Committee notes that, according to the information furnished by the Government, the persons concerned were sentenced for offences under this Act only, and that fines were imposed having regard to substantial extenuating circumstances.

229. The Committee therefore recommends the Governing Body, while noting that the accused persons are not being detained and that they have merely been fined, to draw the Government's attention to the fact that the restrictive nature of the provisions governing strikes and the possible consequence of the procedure to be followed before a strike may be declared appear to make it possible for strikers to be liable in all cases to penal sanctions, which would imply a violation of the provision of Convention No. 87 that " the law of the land shall not be such as to impair, nor shall it be so applied as to impair, the guarantees provided for " in the Convention (Article 8, paragraph 2), and especially the right of workers' organisations to " organise their administration and activities and to formulate their programmes " (Article 3).

230. In all the circumstances, while reaffirming the principle that allegations respecting the right to strike are within its competence, in so far—but only in so far—as they affect the exercise of trade union rights, the Committee recommends the Governing Body—

(a) to draw the Government's attention once again to the desirability of re-examining the provisions respecting strikes in the light of the considerations set forth in paragraphs 224 and 226 above, so as to establish a simplified procedure prior to the declaration of a strike and thereby ensure that the workers are not deprived in practice of one of the essential means at their disposal for furthering their demands ;

(b) while noting that the accused persons are not being detained and that they have merely been fined, to draw the Government's attention to the fact that the restrictive nature of the provisions governing strikes and the possible consequence of the procedure to be followed before a strike may be declared appear to make it possible for strikers to be liable in all cases to penal sanctions, which would imply a violation of the provisions of Convention No. 87 that " the law of the land shall not be such as to impair, nor shall it be so applied as to impair, the guarantees provided for " in the Convention (Article 8, paragraph 2), and especially the rights of workers' organisations to " organise their administration and activities and to formulate their programmes " (Article 3).

Case No. 415 :

Complaint Presented by the International Federation of Commercial, Clerical and Technical Employees and the Commercial, Technical and Allied Workers' Union of St. Vincent against the Government of the United Kingdom in respect of St. Vincent 231. The International Federation of Commercial, Clerical and Technical Employees, on 2 October, 24 November and 15 December 1964, submitted various communications received from the Commercial, Technical and Allied Workers' Union of St. Vincent, which contain a series of allegations respecting the violation of freedom of association in St. Vincent. These communications, together with the observations thereon made by the Government of St. Vincent and forwarded by the United Kingdom on 20 January 1965, were considered by the Committee at its meeting in May 1965, when the Committee submitted to the Governing Body the interim report contained in paragraphs 41 to 62 of its 84th Report, which was approved by the Governing Body on 24 June 1965, in the course of its 162nd Session. This report contained a request for further information on certain points, and was brought to the notice of the Government of the United Kingdom by a letter dated 9 July 1965. By a letter dated 6 October 1965 the Government of the United Kingdom forwarded further observations prepared by the Government of St. Vincent.

232. The Government of the United Kingdom has ratified the Right of Association (Agriculture) Convention, 1921 (No. 11), the Right of Association (Non-Metropolitan Territories) Convention, 1947 (No. 84), and the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), and has declared that their provisions are applicable without modification to St. Vincent. It has also ratified the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), and has declared it applicable with modifications to St. Vincent. These modifications relate to the composition of the committee of management of a trade union, the taking of decisions by secret ballot in certain cases, and the use to which trade union funds may be put.

Allegations relating to the Non-Recognition of the Commercial, Technical and Allied Workers' Union of St. Vincent for the Purpose of Collective Bargaining

233. These allegations and the Government's observations thereon were analysed at length, when the Committee met in May 1965, in paragraphs 43 to 56 of the Committee's 84th Report. The Committee recommended the Governing Body, in paragraph 62 (a) of its 84th Report—

. . . . . .

(i) to draw the Government's attention to the provision contained in Article 3 of the Right of Association (Non-Metropolitan Territories) Convention, 1947 (No. 84), that all practicable measures shall be taken to assure to trade unions which are representative of the workers concerned the right to conclude collective agreements with employers or employers' organisations; and also the provision contained in Article 4 of the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), that measures appropriate to national conditions shall be taken, where necessary, to encourage and promote the full development and utilisation of machinery for voluntary negotiation between employers or employers' organisations and workers' organisations, with a view to the regulation of terms and conditions of employment by means of collective agreements;

(ii) to stress the importance it attaches to the principle that government authorities, in their capacity as employers, should recognise for the purposes of collective bargaining the representative workers' organisations; and

(iii) to draw the attention of the Government to its view that the attitude adopted by the authorities in the present case in not taking steps to recognise the majority union representing the workers at the Public Health Department and at the Mental Hospital does not appear to have been consistent with the principles contained in Conventions Nos. 84 and 98, which enumerate the procedure of collective bargaining as a means of determining conditions of employment.

234. In its latest observations the Government of St. Vincent states that the Commercial, Technical and Allied Workers' Union of St. Vincent is now provisionally registered and has been granted all the bargaining rights which it has claimed and that negotiations are proceeding between employers and the union and also that the Government has recognised the bargaining rights of the union in respect of scavengers employed by the Public Health Department and Mental Hospital workers.

235. The Committee recommends the Governing Body to take note of this statement.

Allegations relating to the Final Registration of Trade Unions

236. In paragraphs 57 to 59 of its 84th Report the Committee examined a provision contained in Ordinance No. 30 of 1954 which allows the Registrar to refuse final registration of a trade union if he considers that the union has not yet attained a reasonable degree of efficiency and organisation in the management of its affairs. In the view of the Committee this provision gave excessive scope to the Registrar in determining whether registration should or should not be granted to an industrial association. In the present case final registration had been refused to the complaining organisation pursuant to this provision.

237. The Committee noted that the law permitted an appeal to the Supreme Court from the Registrar's decision, but recalled that in such cases the I.L.O. Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations had pointed out that " the existence of a procedure of appeal to the courts does not appear to be a sufficient guarantee; in effect this does not alter the nature of the powers conferred on the authorities responsible for effecting registration, and the judges hearing such an appeal ... would only be able to ensure that the legislation had been correctly applied ".[1]

238. The Committee, therefore, in paragraph 62 (b) of its 84th Report, recommended the Governing Body—

. . . . . .

(i) to draw the Government's attention to the desirability of defining clearly in its legislation the specific conditions that trade unions must satisfy in order to qualify for registration and of prescribing specific legal criteria for the purpose of deciding whether they have satisfied such conditions;

(ii) to suggest to the Government the possibility of examining in detail the provisions of Ordinance No. 30 of 1954 with a view to deciding what amendments might be introduced in the light of the foregoing conclusions.

239. In the observations furnished on 6 October 1965 the Government of St. Vincent states that the various ordinances, if reasonably interpreted, are clear, but that consideration is being given to possible amendments.

240. The Committee recommends the Governing Body to take note of this statement, to express the hope that in the consideration of possible amendments to Ordinance No. 30 of 1954 account will be taken of the principle set forth in paragraph 62 (b) (i) of the Committee's 84th Report cited above, and to request the Government of the United Kingdom to be good enough to keep the Governing Body informed of further developments in this connection.

Allegations relating to Coercive Measures against Workers in connection with Their Trade Union Membership

241. It is alleged that, since the Commercial, Technical and Allied Workers' Union began, on 16 September 1963, to seek to be recognised as the collective bargaining representative of employees of the Public Health Department and the Mental Hospital, the Chief Minister for the Crown and the Minister of Social Services, who is responsible for public health, have attacked the union and have threatened the employees of the institutions mentioned above with victimisation. It is alleged that the Chief Minister stated at a political meeting that as long as his Government remained in office it would not recognise the union and that any attempt by the workers to strike would result in their services being terminated. The Chief Minister, it is alleged, is the leader of a government-controlled union which he is seeking to force upon employees of government institutions in rivalry with the complaining organisation.

242. After the complaining union had made a further application on 27 January 1964 for recognition as representative of the employees of the Mental Hospital, it is alleged, the competent Minister visited the institution and threatened the workers and forbade them to join the complaining union.

243. When the Committee met in May 1965 it noted that the observations of the Government furnished on 20 January 1965 contained no comments with respect to these allegations. The Committee recalled the importance it has always attached [2] to the provision contained in Article 1 of the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), that workers shall enjoy adequate protection against acts of anti-union discrimination in respect of their employment, and pointed out, in paragraph 60 of its 84th Report, that the consequences of this provision are that the Government must take measures, whenever necessary, to ensure that this protection is effective, which of course implies that the authorities must refrain from any act likely to provoke or have as its object anti-union discrimination against workers in respect of their employment.

244. In these circumstances the Committee, in paragraph 62 (d) of its 84th Report, recommended the Governing Body to request the Government to furnish its observations on this aspect of the case.

245. In the observations furnished on 6 October 1965 the Government of St. Vincent states that " it is necessary to differentiate between coercive measures by Government qua government and statements made at party political meetings which by custom are of a nature and frequency peculiar to all political parties in St. Vincent " and that " the Ministry concerned is unaware of any factual coercive measures taken against workers in connection with their trade union membership ".

246. In all the circumstances the Committee recommends the Governing Body—

(a) to take note with regard to the allegations relating to the non-recognition of the Commercial, Technical and Allied Workers' Union of St. Vincent, of the statement by the Government of St. Vincent that this union is now provisionally registered and has been granted all the bargaining rights which it has claimed, that negotiations are proceeding between employers and the union, and that, in particular, the Government has recognised the bargaining rights of the union in respect of scavengers employed by the Public Health Department and Mental Hospital workers;

(b) to decide, with respect to the allegations relating to the final registration of trade unions—

(i) to take note of the statement by the Government of St. Vincent that consideration is being given to possible amendments to the provisions of Ordinance No. 30 of 1954;

(ii) to express the hope that, in this connection, regard will be had to the desirability of defining clearly in its legislation the specific conditions that trade unions must satisfy in order to qualify for registration and of prescribing specific legal criteria for the purpose of deciding whether they have satisfied such conditions;

(iii) to request the Government of the United Kingdom to be good enough to keep the Governing Body informed of further developments in this connection;

(c) to draw attention, with regard to the allegations relating to coercive measures against workers in connection with their trade union membership, to the danger of statements of the kind alleged being interpreted as intended to exert pressure on workers when exercising their right to join the organisation of their own choosing.

Case No. 191:

Complaints Presented by the Confederation of Arab Trade Unions, the World Federation of Trade Unions and the Sudan Railway Workers' Union against the Government of Sudan

248. Sudan has ratified the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), but has not ratified the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87).

249. When it examined the case at its meeting in February 1962 the Committee, in paragraph 162 of its 60th Report, made the following recommendations to the Governing Body:

... the Committee recommends the Governing Body—

(a) to decide, with respect to the allegations relating to the suspension of the trade unions of Sudan—

(i) to take note of the Government's statement that 48 trade unions, representing 42,000 industrial workers, have now been registered under the Trade Unions (Amendment) Ordinance, 1960, and that ten further applications for registration are under consideration;

(ii) to request the Government to be good enough, bearing in mind the hope expressed by the Governing Body when it adopted paragraph 90 (a) (ii) of the Committee's 48th Report, cited in paragraph 117 above, to continue to keep the Governing Body informed of further developments with regard to the formation and functioning of trade unions in Sudan;

(b) to decide, with respect to the allegations relating to the trade union press—

(i) to take note of the Government's statement that it has no objection in principle to allowing trade unions to express their opinions by publishing their own newspapers;

(ii) to request the Government to inform the Governing Body whether this statement means that the freedom of the trade union press has now been re-established or will now be re-established in Sudan, in accordance with the hope expressed by the Governing Body when it approved paragraph 90 (b) (ii) of the Committee's 48th Report;

(iii) to request the Government to furnish its observations on the allegations made by the World Federation of Trade Unions in its communication dated 5 June 1961, to which reference is made in paragraph 123 above;

(c) to request the Government to furnish its observations on the allegations relating to arrests of trade unionists made by the World Federation of Trade Unions in its communication dated 5 June 1961 and which are referred to in paragraphs 129 and 130 above;

(d) to decide, with respect to certain matters arising out of the Trade Unions (Amendment) Ordinance, 1960—

(i) to draw the attention of the Government to the importance which the Governing Body attaches to the generally accepted principle that workers without distinction whatsoever should have the right to establish and join trade union organisations;

(ii) to express the hope that the Government will now consider amending section 2 of the Trade Unions Ordinance, as amended in 1960, so as to give full effect to the principle enumerated in subparagraph (i) above;

(iii) to request the Government to be good enough to keep the Governing Body informed as to further developments in this connection;

(iv) to draw the attention of the Government to the importance which the Governing Body attaches to the generally accepted principle that workers should have the right to establish and join organisations of their own choosing;

(v) to express the hope that the Government, having regard to the considerations set forth in paragraphs 134, 136 and 137 above, will now consider amending sections 9 (1) and 27 (3) of the Trade Unions Ordinance, as amended in 1960, so as to give full effect to the principle enunciated in subparagraph (iv) above;

(vi) to request the Government to be good enough to keep the Governing Body informed as to further developments in this connection;

(vii) to draw the attention of the Government to the importance which it attaches to the generally recognised principles that workers' organisations should have the right to establish and join federations and confederations and that any such organisation, federation or confederation should have the right to affiliate with international organisations of workers;

(viii) to point out to the Government that the question as to whether a need to form federations and confederations is felt or not is a matter to be determined solely by the workers and workers' organisations themselves after their right to form them has been legally recognised;

(ix) to express the hope that the Government will now consider amending the provisions of the Trade Unions Ordinance, as amended in 1960, so as to give full effect to the principles enunciated in subparagraph (vii) above;

(x) to request the Government to be good enough to keep the Governing Body informed as to further developments in this connection;

(e) to decide, with respect to the allegations relating to the dissolution of the Sudan Railway Workers' Union—

(i) to draw the attention of the Government to its view that dissolution by the Executive in exercise of the legislative functions with which the Government is endowed, like dissolution by virtue of administrative powers, does not ensure the right of defence which normal judicial procedure alone can guarantee, and to the importance which it attaches to the principle that workers' and employers' organisations should not be liable to be dissolved or suspended by administrative authority;

(ii) to suggest to the Government that it may care to reconsider the provisions of sections 9 and 16 of the Trade Disputes Act, 1960, in the light of the considerations set forth in paragraph 160 above.

250. At its meeting in February 1964 the Committee had before it a communication from the Government dated 2 December 1963 in which the Government stated that the Supreme Council for the Armed Forces had accepted the principle of the establishment of a trade union federation, had decided to authorise the establishment of a railway workers' union and had accepted the amendment of the Trade Unions Ordinance so as to extend the right of organisation to all workers who were not yet organised. These decisions were noted by the Committee in paragraphs 152, 153, and 154 of its 74th Report.

251. The Committee made the following recommendations to the Governing Body in paragraph 156 of its 74th Report:

Having regard to the foregoing, the Committee recommends the Governing Body—

(a) to thank the Government for the information which it has been good enough to communicate, and to take note of that information with interest;

(b) to request the Government to furnish to the Committee, as it has already declared its intention of doing, more detailed information on the matters mentioned in paragraphs 152, 153 and 154 above;

(c) to request the Government again to be good enough to furnish the further information requested in subparagraphs (a) (ii), (b) (ii) and (iii), (c), (d) (iii), (vi) and (x) of paragraph 162 of the 60th Report of the Committee;

(d) to express the hope that the Government will furnish the information referred to in subparagraphs (b) and (c) above at an early date;

(e) to take note of the present interim report, it being understood that the Committee will report further to the Governing Body when it has received the additional information in question.

252. These recommendations were approved by the Governing Body at its 159th Session (June-July 1964) and were brought to the notice of the Government by a letter dated 18 June 1964.

253. On 9 September 1964 the World Federation of Trade Unions submitted a further document of complaint.

254. In this communication W.F.T.U. alleged that on 14 August 1964 the Government banned the Constituent Congress of the Sudanese Federation of Unions just before it was due to be held, dissolved the constituent committee and ordered its functions to be transferred to an executive committee composed of the presidents of the ten main unions of the country, which was to draw up a constitution for the Federation. It was ordered that no workers' congress should be called before the executive committee had finished its work and the Minister of Information and Labour had given his agreement, and that all the trade unions should retain their existing executives until the end of 1965 except for necessary changes with the consent of the Trade Union Registrar. The complainant considered that these measures were in violation of the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), ratified by Sudan, and disregarded the recommendations contained in the reports of the Committee on Freedom of Association.

255. This complaint was transmitted to the Government for its observations by a letter dated 18 September 1964.

256. The Government furnished observations in a communication dated 24 June 1965.

257. The Government begins by stating that the complaints relate to the period of the military régime in Sudan between December 1958 and October 1964, whereas on 1 November 1964 the Supreme Council for the Armed Forces was replaced by a National Government, in accordance with a new National Charter signed by representatives of all democratic organisations and providing, among other things, for " total freedom of organisation, association and freedom of expression ". A caretaker government was formed, in which the Minister of State for Cabinet Affairs was Mr. Shafia Ahmed El Sheikh, the newly elected Secretary-General of the reformed Sudan Trade Union Federation.

258. Under the military régime there had been 88 trade unions, a number which, according to the Government, had grown to 200 by June 1965. The Government declares that unions enjoy complete freedom to send their elected representatives abroad to international conferences, to associate with international federations and confederations of their own choosing and to express their views freely in the press. The Trade Union Federation's organ, El-Taliaa, is now published weekly. All trade unionists, says the Government, now have complete freedom of movement.

259. The Government states that, on 7 April 1965, the Sudan Council of Ministers repealed the Trade Unions (Amendment) Ordinance, 1960, and that " the 1948 Ordinance, now back in full force, extends the right of organisation to all workers who are not yet organised ".

260. On 10 June 1965 an elected government took office. The Prime Minister declared in the Constituent Assembly that his Government is bound by all international agreements entered into by previous governments.

261. In conclusion, the Government expresses the view that the previous grounds for complaint no longer apply.

262. In earlier cases[1] the Committee has taken the view, when it has had before it allegations relating to violations of trade union rights by an earlier government, that although the government in power could obviously not be held responsible for events which took place under its predecessor, it is clearly responsible for any continuing consequences which they may have had since its accession to power.

263. It would appear from the Government's reply that trade union freedom has been restored and that the legal situation relating to freedom of association is that which prevailed before the military authorities assumed power in 1958, that is to say, it is governed entirely by the Trade Unions Ordinance, 1948, the amending ordinance of 1960 having been repealed. There would therefore appear to be no purpose in pursuing further the matters arising from the fact that the trade unions were dissolved in 1958 or those arising out of the Trade Unions (Amendment) Ordinance, 1960. In other words, the questions referred to in paragraph 156 (b) of the Committee's 74th Report appear to have been disposed of as a result of the information now furnished by the Government, as do those referred to in subparagraphs (a) (ii) and (d) (iii), (vi) and (x) of paragraph 162 of the 60th Report of the Committee cited in paragraph 249 above. Moreover, the points referred to in subparagraph (b) (ii) and (iii) of paragraph 162 of the said report now appear to require no further consideration in view of the Government's statement that the freedom of the trade union press has been restored.

264. There remains the point covered by subparagraph (c) of paragraph 162 of the Committee's 60th Report. This related to allegations of arrests of trade unionists referred to by W.F.T.U. in its communication dated 5 June 1961 and analysed in paragraphs 129 and 130 of the Committee's 60th Report. According to those allegations three officers of the Sudan trade unions, Messrs. El Shafia Ahmed El Sheikh, Shakir Mursal and Taha Mohamed Ali were still in prison. In a communication dated 25 August 1959 the Government had said that they had been sentenced by court martial to five years' imprisonment. Further, it was alleged, the following trade unionists had been sentenced at Atbara to varying terms of imprisonment: Messrs. Abdul Fattah Osman, Khidir Nasr, Khalifa Mahgoub, Sir El Khatim Rashwan, Ahmed El Badawi El Salflawi, Ahmed Ali Ibrahim and El Hag Mohammed Salih. In its latest reply the Government makes no specific reference as to the liberation of trade unionists imprisoned under the preceding régime beyond what may be implied from its statement that " all trade unionists now have complete freedom of movement ", and apart from the fact that Mr. El Shafia Ahmed El Sheikh is now the Secretary-General of the reformed Sudan Trade Union Federation.

[1] See Second Report, Case No. 13 (Bolivia), para. 149; 25th Report, Case No. 129 (Peru), para. 15; 28th Report, Case No. 146 (Colombia), paras. 217 and 222-223; 56th Report, Case No. 159 (Cuba), paras. 78 and 79; 72nd Report, Case No. 260 (Iraq), para. 78; 78th Report, Case No. 316 (Ecuador), para. 108; 83rd Report, Case No. 406 (United Kingdom-British Guiana), para. 320.

265. In these circumstances the Committee recommends the Governing Body—

(a) to note with satisfaction that the Trade Unions (Amendment) Ordinance, 1960, which has been the subject of various allegations, was repealed on 7 April 1965;

(b) to note the Government's statements, in its communication dated 24 June 1965, that the right of organisation is now governed, as before the events of 1958 which gave rise to the complaints, by the Trade Unions Ordinance, 1948, that trade unions are now being formed and operating in freedom and that the freedom of the trade union press has been restored;

(c) to request the Government, having regard to its statement that all trade unionists now have complete freedom of movement, to confirm that all the trade unionists sentenced to imprisonment by court martial under the military régime, including in particular those indicated in paragraph 264 above, are now at liberty.

Case No. 274 :

Complaint Presented by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions and the Confederation of Arab Trade Unions against the Government of Libya

266. When the Committee examined this case at its meeting in February 1962 it submitted an interim report in paragraphs 212 to 281 of its 60th Report, which was approved by the Governing Body at its 151st Session (March 1962).

267. Paragraph 281 of the 60th Report of the Committee, containing the recommendations of the Committee as approved by the Governing Body, reads as follows:

In all the circumstances the Committee, after examining the complaint and the observations of the Government of Libya thereon, and having taken into account the factual evidence obtained by the I.L.O. representative who visited Libya in January 1962, recommends the Governing Body—

(a) to decide that the allegations relating to the sequestration of union funds do not call for further examination;

(b) to decide that, subject to the observations contained in paragraph 254 above, no useful purpose would be served by pursuing further its examination of the allegations relating to the violation of trade union premises;

(c) to decide, with respect to the allegations relating to the refusal to admit representatives of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions to Libya—

(i) to draw the attention of the Government to the importance which the Governing Body attaches to the principle that national trade union organisations should have the right freely to maintain contact with the international organisations of workers to which they are affiliated;

(ii) to note the Government's expression of regret that the representatives of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions who were sent to Libya were not admitted to the national territory and its assurance that such representatives will in future be welcomed at any time;

(iii) to conclude therefore that, subject to the observation made in subparagraph (i) above, there is no ground for it to pursue further its examination of these allegations;

(d) to decide, with respect to the allegations relating to measures taken against trade union leaders following a strike in 1961—

(i) to draw the attention of the Government to the importance which the Governing Body attaches to the principle set forth in article 40 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation that members of the Governing Body shall enjoy such privileges and immunities as are necessary for the independent exercise of their functions in connection with the Organisation;

(ii) to point out to the Government that Mr. Salem Shita is a member of the Governing Body by virtue of his election thereto by the Workers' group of the International Labour Conference as a representative of that group and not of the workers of Libya;

(iii) to point out to the Government that the requirement that workers' representatives wishing to attend an international meeting outside Libya must obtain a permit to leave the country, this permit being granted by the Council of Ministers on the recommendation of the Ministry of Labour, is not compatible in the case of members of the Governing Body with the principle set forth in subparagraph (i) above;

(iv) to note that Mr. Salem Shita has been acquitted by the Court of Appeal on all the charges brought against him and to request the Government to furnish to the Governing Body the text of the judgment of the Court of Appeal which acquitted him;

(v) to request the Government to state whether any of the persons arrested at the same time as Mr. Shita, and whose trial was stated to be due to take place on 21 November 1961, have in fact been brought to trial and, if so, to furnish information as to the outcome of the proceedings;

(e) to request the Government to furnish a copy of the judgment given in the case of Mr. Ali Bitar, to confirm whether Mr. Bitar has in fact instituted an appeal and, if so, to furnish also a copy of the judgment of the appellate court when it is available;

(f) to decide, with respect to the allegations relating to interference with the right to organise—

(i) to draw the attention of the Government to the importance which the Governing Body has always attached to the principle that workers should enjoy adequate protection against acts of anti-union discrimination in respect of their employment, including acts calculated to make the employment of a worker subject to the condition that he shall not join a union or shall relinquish trade union membership, and acts calculated to cause the dismissal of or otherwise prejudice a worker by reason of union membership;

(ii) to express the hope that the Government, in its desire to promote sound and harmonious industrial relations in Libya, will exercise all possible influence to secure the reinstatement, with full regard for the principle enunciated in subparagraph (i) above, of all the dismissed workers who have not yet been re-engaged, and will keep the Governing Body informed as to developments in this connection;

(iii) to request the Government to inform the Governing Body as to the outcome of the 14 cases of dismissed workers which have been referred to the Court of Urgent Cases;

(iv) to suggest to the Government that it may consider the advisability of amending section 12 of the Labour Code so as to permit workers whose applications to the Director of Labour do not lead to a satisfactory result within a prescribed period to address themselves directly to the courts;

(g) to decide, with respect to the allegations relating to the right to strike in so far as the exercise of trade union rights is affected—

(i) to draw the attention of the Government to the importance which the Governing Body has always attached to the principle that, where strikes by workers are restricted or prohibited, such restriction or prohibition should be accompanied by the provision of conciliation procedures and of independent and impartial arbitration machinery whose awards are in all cases binding on both sides;

(ii) to draw the attention of the Government to the fact that it would not appear to be appropriate for all publicly owned undertakings to be treated on the same basis in respect of limitations of the right to strike without distinguishing in the relevant legislation between those which are genuinely essential and those which are not;

(iii) to suggest to the Government that it may care to reconsider the existing situation in the light of the considerations set forth in subparagraph (ii) above;

(iv) to suggest to the Government that, in so far as the provision prohibiting strikes in public establishments and public utility establishments is maintained, it migth consider, having regard to the principle enunciated in subparagraph (i) above, establishing satisfactory alternative arrangements for the redress of grievances;

(v) to request the Government to be good enough to keep the Governing Body informed as to further developments in this connection;

(h) to decide, with respect to the allegations relating to the prohibition of the establishment of more than one central trade union organisation in Libya—

(i) to draw the attention of the Government to the importance which the Governing Body attaches to the generally recognised principle that workers' organisations should have the right freely to form federations and confederations of their own choosing;

(ii) to express the hope that the Government will reconsider the provisions of section 39*bis* of the Labour Code so as to give full effect to the foregoing principle;

(iii) to request the Government to keep the Governing Body informed of any further developments in this connection;

(i) to decide, with respect to the allegations relating to the requirement of previous authorisation for affiliation with international organisations of workers—

(i) to draw the attention of the Government to the importance which it attaches to the generally accepted principle that trade union organisations should have the right to affiliate with international organisations;

(ii) to express the view that the requirement of governmental permission for such international affiliation is not compatible with this principle;

(iii) to note the Government's statement that the relations of the General Union of Libyan Workers with international organisations will not be affected;

(iv) to suggest to the Government, nevertheless, that it may consider amending its legislation so as to give full effect, both in law and in fact, to the principle enunciated above;

(j) to suggest to the Government that if, in accordance with the earnest hope of the Governing Body, it gives effect to the recommendations made in the foregoing paragraphs, it may then care to give consideration to the possibility of ratifying the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), and the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98).

268. The above conclusions were brought to the notice of the Government of Libya by a letter dated 21 March 1962, since when the Committee has asked the Government on numerous occasions to be good enough to reply to the requests for further information contained therein.

269. In a communication dated 18 February 1965 the Government of Libya refers to its earlier communications dated 12 November 1961 and 15 January 1962, to the information and documentation placed before Lord Forster of Harraby, K.B.E., Q.C., when he visited Libya as representative of the Director-General from 5 to 10 January 1962, and to the observations made by the Libyan delegation at the International Labour Conference in June 1962, and expresses the view that the above sources of information contain a sufficient and satisfactory reply to all the points raised in paragraph 281 of the Committee's report.

270. The Government adds that the labour movement in Libya is receiving all protection and appreciation from the responsible authorities and that it is at all times working hard to raise the standards and improve the conditions of the workers.

271. Libya has not ratified the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87). On 20 June 1962—that is to say, subsequently to the Committee's examination of the substance of the case in February 1962—Libya ratified the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98).

272. The Committee, having regard to the contentions of the Government indicated in paragraph 269 above, has re-examined each of the outstanding allegations in the light of such contentions. It is to be noted, however, that all the sources of information mentioned by the Government, apart from the observations of the Libyan delegation at the International Labour Conference in June 1962, were already before the Committee, and were taken into consideration by it, before it formulated the recommendations to the Governing Body contained in paragraph 281 of its 60th Report.

Allegations relating to Measures Taken against Trade Union Leaders following a Strike in 1961

273. This aspect of the case was considered by the Committee in paragraphs 216 to 235 of its 60th Report. The allegations of I.C.F.T.U. in its communications dated 4 October and 10 November 1961 related to the arrest of Mr. Salem Shita, General Secretary of the General Union of Libyan Workers, on 10 September 1961 and to the arrest at the same time of 18 other trade union leaders, the latter having been provisionally released pending their trial fixed to begin on 21 November 1961. The Government's observations dated 12 November 1961, supplemented by further observations dated 15 January 1962, revealed that Mr. Shita had been acquitted on one charge and convicted on the other charge against him by the lower court, on 3 December 1961, that cross-appeals had been lodged, and that on 25 December 1961 the Court of Appeal had acquitted him on all charges. When the I.L.O. representative, Lord Forster of Harraby, K.B.E., Q.C., was in Libya from 5 to 10 January 1962, copies of the two court decisions relating to Mr. Shita were not available but, as the Committee indicated in paragraph 226 of its 60th Report, the Government had promised him that copies would be forwarded to the I.L.O. As they had not been received, the Committee, in paragraph 281 (d) (iv) of its 60th Report, recommended the Governing Body to request the Government to furnish the text of the judgment of the Court of Appeal which had acquitted him on 25 December 1961. No copy of this judgment has ever been received from the Government.

274. The Committee considers it appropriate to point out, as it has done in many cases in the past, that it has regularly followed the practice, when called upon to examine matters which were the subject of national judicial proceedings, of requesting the governments concerned to communicate the texts of the judgments given and the grounds adduced therein [1], and that generally governments have co-operated with the Committee by responding to such requests. The request for the transmittal of a judgment, therefore, was not a singular proceeding for the Committee to follow in the present case but was in accordance with its normal practice, to which it has always had recourse in order to assess to the full the facts contested in a complaint.

275. With regard to the particular case of Mr. Salem Shita, the Committee observes that in 1964 and 1965 he attended the 48th and 49th Sessions of the International Labour Conference as Workers' delegate of Libya, occupying the post of General Secretary of the Libyan National Federation of Trade Unions, and has continued to serve, apparently in full freedom, as a Workers' deputy member of the Governing Body of the I.L.O. It would appear that his position has thus been regularised and, accordingly, the Committee recommends the Governing Body to decide that this aspect of the case should now be regarded as closed.

276. With regard to the allegations that 18 other trade unionists arrested on 10 September 1961 were due to be tried on 21 November 1961, the only comment on this allegation made by the Government was that contained in its communication dated 12 November 1961 to the effect that the Government had referred their cases to the court. No further information on this question was reported by Lord Forster after his visit to Libya in January 1962. At its meeting in February 1962, therefore, the Committee, in paragraph 281 (d) (v) of its 60th Report, recommended the Governing Body to request the Government to state whether any of the persons arrested at the same time as Mr. Shita, and whose trial was stated to be due to take place on 21 November 1961, had in fact been brought to trial and, if so, to furnish information as to the outcome of the proceedings.

277. Since that time no information on this point has been received from the Government of Libya, nor did the Libyan Minister of Labour refer to it in his speech on the Director-General's Report at the 46th Session of the International Labour Conference in June 1962.

278. In these circumstances the Committee recommends the Governing Body to request the Government again to be good enough to state whether any of the 18 trade unionists arrested at the same time as Mr. Shita, and whose trial was stated to have been due to take place on 21 November 1961, have in fact been brought to trial and, if so, to furnish information as to the outcome of the proceedings.

Allegations relating to Mr. Ali Bitar

279. At its meeting in February 1962 the Committee examined, in paragraphs 236 to 243 of its 60th Report, the case of Mr. Ali Bitar, editor of the newspaper of the General Union of Libyan Workers, alleged also to have been arrested on 10 September 1961. In its communications dated 12 November 1961 and 15 January 1962 the Government explained that, in consequence of passages appearing in the newspaper, Mr. Bitar was fined—a fact confirmed by the I.L.O. representative who went to Libya in January 1962 and who said that an appeal by Mr. Bitar was pending. The Committee observed that nothing in the information before it made it clear on the basis of what articles Mr. Bitar was fined and that only the text of the judgment would make it possible for it to elucidate the matter. Consequently, in accordance with its established practice in such cases, the Committee, in paragraph 281 (e) of its 60th Report, recommended the Governing Body to request the Government to furnish a copy of the judgment given in the case of Mr. Ali Bitar, to confirm whether he had in fact instituted an appeal and, if so, to furnish also a copy of the judgment of the appellate court when it was available.

280. The Government has still furnished no further information on this matter, nor was any reference made to it by the Libyan delegation to the 46th Session of the International Labour Conference in June 1962.

281. In these circumstances the Committee recommends the Governing Body to request the Government once again to be good enough to furnish a copy of the judgment given in the case of Mr. Ali Bitar, to confirm whether in fact he instituted an appeal and, if so, to furnish a copy of the judgment given by the appellate court.

Allegations relating to the Re-engagement of Strikers Who Participated in the Strike of September 1961

282. In paragraphs 244 to 250 of its 60th Report the Committee examined allegations relating to strikers who were not re-engaged after the strike which took place in September 1961. In particular, the Committee observed that, arising out of the refusals to re-engage some of the strikers, the Government had stated in its communication dated 15 January 1962 that it had made every effort to ensure their re-engagement and that 14 cases affecting workers whom the employers had refused to re-engage had been referred to the Court of Urgent Cases in Tripolitania, as the Government made clear to the I.L.O. representative who visited Libya from 5 to 10 January 1962.

283. It was in the light of the foregoing that the Committee, in paragraph 281 (f) (ii) and (iii) of its 60th Report, recommended the Governing Body to request the Government to keep the Governing Body informed as to further developments with regard to the reinstatement of all the dismissed workers who had not been re-engaged and to inform the Governing Body as to the outcome of the 14 cases of dismissed workers which had been referred to the Court of Urgent Cases.

284. Since that time no further information has been furnished on this matter, either by the Libyan delegation to the International Labour Conference in June 1962 or by the Government subsequently.

285. In these circumstances the Committee recommends the Governing Body to request the Government to inform it as to how far it succeeded in its efforts to secure the reinstatement of workers who were refused re-engagement following the strike of September 1961 and, more particularly, to inform it as to the outcome of the 14 cases of dismissed workers which were referred to the Court of Urgent Cases in Tripolitania.

Allegations relating to the Prohibition of the Establishment of More than One Central Trade Union Organisation in Libya

286. At its meeting in February 1962 the Committee considered section 39*bis* of the amended Labour Code, permitting the formation of only one central trade union organisation in Libya—an amendment which, according to the Government, was motivated by the need to avoid competitive and challenging interests in the trade union movement and the confusion which had resulted therefrom in the past.[1] The Committee, after emphasising the importance which it attached to the generally accepted principle that workers' organisations should have the right freely to form federations and confederations, observed, in paragraph 275 of its 60th Report, that the I.L.O. Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations, when examining a similar provision in the legislation of another country, had pointed out that such a provision did not appear to be compatible with the principle that trade union organisations should have the right to establish and join federations and confederations of their own choosing without previous authorisation.[2] It was in these circumstances that the Committee made to the Governing Body the recommendations contained in paragraph 281 (h) (i), (ii) and (iii) of its 60th Report cited in paragraph 267 above.

287. At the 46th Session of the International Labour Conference in June 1962 the Libyan Minister of Labour and Social Affairs emphasised his Government's " great awareness and consciousness of securing the freedom of labour movement within the law, as well as of its international obligations and undertakings in this respect ".[3] He did not, however, refer specifically to the problem raised by section 39*bis* of the amended Labour Code, nor has the Government furnished any further observations on this matter.

288. A new Labour Act [4] was promulgated on 22 November 1962, section 64 of which embodied a provision to the effect that " not more than one general federation may be formed in Libya ".

289. In these circumstances the Committee recommends the Governing Body—

(a) to draw the attention of the Government once again to the importance which the Governing Body attaches to the generally recognised principle that workers' organisations should have the right freely to form federations and confederations of their own choosing;

(b) to express the hope that the Government will reconsider the provisions of section 64 of the Labour Code so as to give full effect to the foregoing principle;

(c) to request the Government to keep the Governing Body informed of any further developments in this connection.

Allegations relating to the Refusal to Admit Trade Union Missions to Libya

290. Allegations relating to the alleged refusal to admit representatives of I.C.F.T.U. and other organisations into Libya in September 1961 were examined by the Committee in paragraphs 259 to 262 of its 60th Report. The Committee recommended the Governing Body to draw the attention of the Government to the importance which the Governing Body attaches to the principle that national trade union organisations should have the right freely to maintain contact with the international organisations of workers to which they are affiliated. Noting further, however, that in its communication dated 12 November 1961 the Government had expressed its regret that the representatives of the I.C.F.T.U. had not been admitted to the national territory on the occasion in question and had given its assurance that such representatives would in future be welcomed at any time, the Committee, in paragraph 281 (c) (iii) of its 60th Report, recommended the Governing Body to decide that, subject to the foregoing observations, there was no ground for it to pursue further its examination of these allegations.

291. In a communication dated 28 March 1962 I.C.F.T.U. alleged that an I.C.F.T.U. mission had been refused admission to Libya on 27 March 1962, although the visit had been notified to the Prime Minister in advance and visas had been obtained by the members of the mission.

292. On 1 April 1962 the Government informed the Director-General of the I.L.O. that the I.C.F.T.U. mission had not informed the competent Libyan authorities in advance of its arrival or of the purposes of its visit. Upon their unexpected arrival the competent authorities refused to admit them. The Government added that there was no legal ground for the existence of any connection between I.C.F.T.U. and the labour movement in Libya and accused I.C.F.T.U. of aiming to cause disturbance in Libya under the guise of defending the workers.

293. On 5 April 1962 I.C.F.T.U. addressed a communication to the I.L.O. to which was attached a copy of a letter said to have been sent by I.C.F.T.U. to the Libyan Prime Minister on 16 March 1962. According to the text cited this letter informed the Prime Minister that the mission, whose five members were named, would visit Libya on 27 March 1962, for four or five days, in order to resume normal negotiations with its affiliate, the Libyan General Federation of Trade Unions, and expressed the wish that the mission might also have an interview with the Prime Minister. I.C.F.T.U. also gave the dates on which different Libyan embassies issued visas to the four members of the mission who actually tried to enter Libya (the fifth did not obtain a visa and so did not accompany the others). On 29 March, according to I.C.F.T.U., the Prime Minister expressed regret in a cable and stated that the letter of 16 March had not been received until 29 March.

294. In a further communication dated 19 April 1962 I.C.F.T.U. accused the Government of not implementing the assurance as to the future admission of I.C.F.T.U. representatives which it had given in its communication dated 12 November 1961 and alleged that, when the members of the mission reached the frontier between Tunisia and Libya, an official at the Libyan frontier post cancelled their visas, stating that " he was only carrying out instructions ".

295. I.C.F.T.U. alleged further that, at a press conference in Benghazi on 1 April 1962, the Libyan Minister of Labour and Social Affairs said that the General Union of Libyan Workers (U.G.T.L.) was no longer affiliated to I.C.F.T.U. and that Mr. Salem Shita no longer had any relations with the Libyan trade union movement. U.G.T.L., it was alleged, had at no time indicated a desire to end its affiliation with I.C.F.T.U., nor had U.G.T.L., which alone had competence in the matter, ever informed I.C.F.T.U. that Mr. Shita had been replaced or retired. I.C.F.T.U. expressed the view that the Government was trying to break the international relations of the Libyan trade union movement, contrary to its earlier statement, referred to in paragraph 278 of the Committee's 60th Report, that the new provisions of the Labour Code would " not affect the relations of the General Union and the international organisations ".

296. In a communication dated 7 April 1962 the Confederation of Arab Trade Unions complained that its representatives were refused entry to Libya in October 1961 and that in March 1962 it was prevented by the Government from communicating with the Libyan trade unions.

297. The communication from I.C.F.T.U. dated 5 April 1962 was transmitted to the Government for its observations by a letter dated 30 April 1962; the communication dated 7 April 1962 from the Confederation of Arab Trade Unions and that dated 19 April 1962 from I.C.F.T.U. were transmitted to the Government by a letter dated 9 May 1962. On numerous occasions since that time the Committee has requested the Government to furnish its observations on these complaints, but no such observations have been received.

298. Over three years have now elapsed since the trade union missions in question were refused admission to Libya—at a period when the case of Mr. Salem Shita was a matter of grave concern and was one of the important elements in the chain of events which featured the disturbed period when these incidents took place. Since that time the position of Mr. Shita has become regularised and no further complaints of missions being refused admission to the country have been submitted.

299. In these circumstances the Committee recommends the Governing Body to decide, while again drawing attention to the importance which it attaches to the principle that national trade union organisations should have the right freely to maintain contact with the international organisations of workers to which they are affiliated, that the examination of the allegations relating to the refusal to admit trade union missions to Libya in the spring of 1962 should, for the reasons indicated in paragraph 298 above, now be regarded as closed.

Situation in respect of the Ratification of International Labour Conventions relating to Freedom of Association

300. At the conclusion of its examination of the case in February 1962 the Committee recommended the Governing Body to suggest to the Government that if, in accordance with the earnest hope of the Governing Body, it gave effect to the recommendations contained in paragraph 281 of the Committee's 60th Report, it might then care to give consideration to the possibility of ratifying the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), and the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98).

301. On 20 June 1962 Libya ratified the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98).

302. The Committee therefore recommends the Governing Body to suggest, having regard to the fact that on 20 June 1962 the Government of Libya ratified the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), that the Government may care to consider giving effect in its legislation to the recommendations made in paragraph 281 of the 60th Report of the Committee, with a view to ratifying also the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87).

303. With regard to the case as a whole the Committee recommends the Governing Body—

(a) to decide, for the reasons indicated in paragraph 275 above, that the examination of the allegations relating to measures taken against Mr. Salem Shita, formerly General Secretary of the General Union of Libyan Workers and now General Secretary of the Libyan National Federation of Trade Unions, should now be regarded as closed;

(b) to decide, while again drawing attention to the importance which the Governing Body attaches to the principle that national trade union organisations should have the right freely to maintain contact with the international organisations to which they are affiliated, that the examination of the allegations relating to the refusal to admit trade union missions to Libya in the spring of 1962 should, for the reasons indicated in paragraph 298 above, now be regarded as closed;

(c) to request the Government once again to be good enough to state whether any of the 18 trade unionists arrested at the same time as Mr. Shita, and whose trial was stated to have been due to take place on 21 December 1961, have in fact been brought to trial, and, if so, to furnish information as to the outcome of the proceedings;

(d) to request the Government once again to be good enough to furnish a copy of the judgment given in the case of Mr. Ali Bitar, to confirm whether in fact he instituted an appeal and, if so, to furnish a copy of the judgment given by the appellate court;

(e) to request the Government to inform the Governing Body as to how far it succeeded in its efforts to secure the reinstatement of workers who were refused re-engagement following the strike of September 1961, and, more particularly, to inform the Governing Body as to the outcome of the 14 cases of dismissed workers which were referred to the Court of Urgent Cases in Tripolitania;

(f) to decide, with regard to the allegations relating to the prohibition of the establishment of more than one central trade union organisation in Libya—

(i) to draw the attention of the Government once again to the importance which the Governing Body attaches to the generally recognised principle that workers' organisations should have the right freely to form federations and confederations of their own choosing;

(ii) to express the hope that the Government will reconsider the provisions of section 64 of the Labour Code so as to give full effect to the foregoing principle;

(iii) to request the Government to keep the Governing Body informed of any further developments in this connection;

(g) to suggest, having regard to the fact that on 20 June 1962 the Government of Libya ratified the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), that the Government may care to consider giving effect in its legislation to the recommendations made in paragraph 281 of the 60th Report of the Committee, with a view to ratifying also the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87).

Cases Nos. 282 and 401:

Complaint Presented by the International Federation of Christian Trade Unions and the Pan African Workers' Congress against the Government of Burundi

304. The complaints contain three series of allegations: one series relating to executions and threats of execution of trade union leaders in October-November 1965, the second and third series, part of which may have been superseded by the very serious present situation, relating to arrests and threatened executions in 1964 and to the murder of four trade unionists in January 1962.

Allegations relating to Executions and Threats of Execution of Trade Union Leaders in October-November 1965

305. In a cable dated 2 November 1965 the Secretary-General of I.F.C.T.U. stated that Mr. Niyirikana, President of the Burundi Christian Trade Union, and Mr. Mayondo, counsellor of that organisation, had been executed on 25 October 1965 at Bujumbura, without trial, and that other trade union leaders had been placed on a list of persons to be executed. His Federation asked the Director-General to intervene urgently on behalf of other leaders who, it contended, were also to be executed.

306. Immediately upon receipt of this cable, on 3 November 1965, the Director-General despatched a cable to the Prime Minister of Burundi in which, after indicating the contents of the cable received from I.F.C.T.U., he stated that, in accordance with the existing procedure, the complaint would be brought to the notice of the Committee on Freedom of Association set up by the Governing Body for the purpose of examining such complaints in accordance with the procedure established at the request of the United Nations. The Director-General informed the Prime Minister that the Committee would meet on 8 November, but said that he felt obliged to draw the matter to the personal attention of the Prime Minister without delay, and that he would keenly appreciate receiving information on the matter.

307. No reply to his cable dated 3 November 1965 has been received by the Director-General from the Prime Minister of Burundi.

308. The Committee has always attached the greatest importance to the right of all detained persons to receive a fair trial at the earliest possible moment.[1] At the present moment it has before it allegations of executions and threatened executions of trade union leaders with complete disregard for the principle of fair trial.

309. In these circumstances the Committee recommends the Governing Body—

(a) to draw the attention of the Government of Burundi to the importance which it has always attached to the right of all detained persons to receive a fair trial by an impartial and independent judicial authority at the earliest possible moment;

(b) to express its grave concern in view of the allegations it has before it concerning executions and threatened executions of trade union leaders in Burundi without trial;

(c) to urge the Government to furnish to the Governing Body, as a matter of special urgency, its observations on the matters raised in the cable from I.F.C.T.U. dated 2 November 1965 which the Director-General brought to the personal attention of the Prime Minister of Burundi in a cable dated 3 November 1965.

Allegations relating to Arrests and Threatened Executions of Trade Union Leaders in 1964

310. Earlier complaints were received from I.F.C.T.U. dated 13 May, 10 July and 23 October 1964.

311. The essence of the allegations in the first two complaints was that, in July 1964, Mr. Mayondo and certain other trade unionists were in Rwanda but that several leading and active members of the Burundi Christian Trade Union were in prison in Burundi, including the following eight persons: Messrs. Gabriel Gegera, Mathieu Ntahomarikiye, Léon Monwangari, Lucien Nahinana, Uoachim Baridwegur, Venant Ntwenga, Emile Nigere, Anaclet Burundi.

312. The complaint dated 23 October 1964 expressed fears that six trade unionists, including Messrs. Ntwenga and Burundi, were about to be executed.

313. After having failed to reply to six separate requests to furnish its observations on these complaints, the Government, in a letter dated 8 September 1965, states that the circumstances of the case are " in no way of general significance " and that " the persons concerned in the complaint have been dealt with not as trade unionists but as individual persons ". The Government considers that " it would therefore be desirable for this case to be closed without further action, thereby putting an end to the interminable correspondence which has already been exchanged in this connection ".

314. The Committee has pointed out in many cases in the past [1] that, where allegations that trade union leaders or workers have been arrested or detained on account of trade union activities for reasons of internal security or for common law crimes, the Committee has always followed the rule that the governments concerned should be requested to submit further information as precise as possible concerning the arrests or detentions and the exact reasons therefor.

315. In particular, the Committee, in view of the importance it has always attached to the right of all detained persons to receive a fair trial at the earliest possible moment, has always followed the practice in such cases of requesting governments to be good enough to inform it whether legal proceedings had been instituted against the persons concerned and, if so, to furnish copies of the judgments given and of the reasons adduced therein.

316. In the present case the Government appears to consider that a very brief and general reply which it has made is sufficient.

317. In this connection the Committee has pointed out, in certain past cases in which governments have sought to maintain that a reply in general terms to the effect that detentions of trade unionists have been due to unlawful or subversive activity and not to their trade union activities should be regarded by the Committee as adequately substantiated, that the question as to whether the matter in respect of which sentences have been imposed or detentions ordered is to be regarded as a matter relating to a criminal offence or a matter relating to the exercise of trade union rights is not one which can be determined unilaterally by the government concerned, in such a manner as to prevent the Governing Body from inquiring into it.[2]

318. The Committee draws special attention to the resolution concerning freedom of association and protection of the right to organise adopted by the First African Regional Conference of the International Labour Organisation (Lagos, December 1960). Paragraph 7 of this resolution—

Requests the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to invite governments in respect of whose countries complaints may be made to the Governing Body Committee on Freedom of Association to give their wholehearted co-operation to that Committee, in particular by replying to requests for observations made to them and by taking the fullest possible account of any recommendations which may be made to them by the Governing Body following examination of such complaints; and paragraph 8—

Requests the Governing Body to accelerate as far as possible the procedure of its Committee on Freedom of Association and to give greater publicity to the conclusions of that Committee, particularly when certain governments refuse to co-operate loyally in the consideration of complaints submitted against them.

319. In these circumstances the Committee recommends the Governing Body—

(a) to draw the attention of the Government to the fact that the question as to whether the matter in respect of which sentences have been imposed on trade unionists or detentions ordered is to be regarded as a matter relating to a criminal offence or a matter relating to the exercise of trade union rights is not one which can be determined unilaterally by the government concerned, in such a manner as to prevent the Governing Body from inquiring further into it;

(b) to request the Government to be good enough to furnish, as a matter of urgency, information as to the exact reasons for the detentions of the persons referred to in the complaints dated 10 July and 23 October 1964 and as to their present situation, and to state whether legal proceedings have been instituted against any of the persons concerned and, if so, to furnish copies of the judgments given and of the reasons adduced therein;

(c) to draw the attention of the Government to the importance which should be attached to the resolution adopted by the First African Regional Conference of the International Labour Organisation (Lagos, December 1960), and in particular to paragraphs 7 and 8 of the resolution cited in paragraph 318 above.

Allegations relating to the Murder of Four Trade Unionists in January 1962

320. In their communications of January and February 1962 the complainants alleged that on 15 January 1962 four trade unionists, Messrs. Nduwabike, Ndinzurwaha, Ntaymerijakiri and Baravura, had been assassinated at Usumbura. They allege that these murders were committed by youth members of the Uprona Party at the instigation of the authorities.

321. When these complaints were presented, as Belgium was responsible for the international relations of Burundi, the request for observations was addressed to the Belgian Government. On 4 April 1962 the Belgian Government replied stating that as soon as the facts were known immediate measures were taken and some 20 suspects were arrested.

322. The Committee, and then the Governing Body, asked to be kept informed of the results of the inquiry undertaken. Burundi meanwhile having gained independence and become a Member of the I.L.O., this request was addressed to the Government of Burundi, for the first time, by a letter dated 9 April 1963. This request was repeated no less than 14 times without any reply ever being received by the I.L.O.

323. In these circumstances, while recognising that the events in question are now a matter of the past, as they took place in January 1962, the Committee recommended the Governing Body to draw the attention of the Government to the importance which should be attached to the resolution adopted by the First African Regional Conference of the I.L.O. and, in particular, to the paragraphs of that resolution cited in paragraph 318 above.

324. In these circumstances the Committee recommends the Governing Body—

(a) to draw the attention of the Government of Burundi to the importance which the Governing Body has always attached to the right of all detained persons to receive a fair trial by an impartial and independent judicial authority at the earliest possible moment;

(b) to express its grave concern in view of the allegations it has before it concerning executions and threatened executions of trade union leaders in Burundi without trial;

(c) to urge the Government to furnish to the Governing Body, as a matter of special urgency, its observations on the matters raised in the cable from I.F.C.T.U. dated 2 November 1965 which the Director-General brought to the personal attention of the Prime Minister of Burundi in a cable dated 3 November 1965;

(d) to decide, with regard to the allegations relating to arrests and threatened executions of trade union leaders in 1964—

(i) to draw the attention of the Government to the fact that the question as to whether the matter in respect of which sentences have been imposed on trade unionists or detentions ordered is to be regarded as a matter relating to a criminal offence or a matter relating to the exercise of trade union rights is not one which can be determined unilaterally by the government concerned, in such a manner as to prevent the Governing Body from inquiring further into it;

(ii) to request the Government to be good enough to furnish, as a matter of urgency, information as to the exact reasons for the detentions of the persons referred to in the complaints dated 10 July and 23 October 1964 and as to their present situation, and to state whether legal proceedings have been instituted against any of the persons concerned and, if so, to furnish copies of the judgments given and of the reasons adduced therein;

(e) to draw the attention of the Government to the importance which should be attached to the resolution adopted by the First African Regional Conference of the I.L.O. (Lagos, December 1960) and, in particular, to paragraphs 7 and 8 of that resolution which are cited in paragraph 318 above.

Case No. 291 :

Complaints Presented by the Confederation of Arab Trade Unions, the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, the World Federation of Trade Unions, the Aden Trades Union Congress, the Postal, Telegraph and Telephone International and the Arab Federation of Petroleum Workers (Cairo) against the Government of the United Kingdom in respect of Aden

325. The Committee, after having considered this case at its meetings in February 1963[1], May 1963 [2] and June 1964 [3], considered it further at its meeting in February 1965, when it submitted to the Governing Body the interim report respecting the allegations still outstanding contained in paragraphs 71 to 105 of its 81st Report, which was approved by the Governing Body at its 161st Session (March 1965).

326. At its meeting in February 1965 the Committee submitted definitive conclusions to the Governing Body with respect to certain allegations relating to the application of the penal provisions of the Industrial Relations (Conciliation and Arbitration) Ordinance, 1960. With regard to the other outstanding allegations, which are dealt with in the present report, the Committee formulated requests to the Government to furnish further information and observations on certain points.

[2] See 70th Report, paras. 219-279.

[3] See 76th Report, paras. 118-211.

327. These requests were brought to the notice of the Government of the United Kingdom by a letter dated 9 March 1965. The Government furnished a reply by a letter dated 26 May 1965.

328. The United Kingdom has ratified the Right of Association (Non-Metropolitan Territories) Convention, 1947 (No. 84), the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), and the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), and has declared them to be applicable, without modification, to Aden.

Allegations relating to the Industrial Relations (Conciliation and Arbitration) Ordinance, 1960

329. At its meeting in February 1965 the Committee took note, in paragraphs 75 and 76 of its 81st Report, of a statement by the Government in its communication dated 6 November 1964 that the Aden Joint Advisory Council, in which the Aden Trades Union Congress was participating, had made recommendations to the Government of Aden concerning possible amendments to the Industrial Relations (Conciliation and Arbitration) Ordinance, 1960, that the new Aden Government would give early consideration to this matter and that the recommendations of the Council would be taken fully into account when this was done. The Committee requested the Government to be good enough to inform it, as soon as possible, of further developments in the matter.

330. In its communication dated 26 May 1965 the Government states that a Bill to repeal the Industrial Relations (Conciliation and Arbitration) Ordinance, 1960, and to provide for industrial relations procedure in essential services will shortly be published for presentation to the Aden Legislative Council.

331. The Aden T.U.C., in a communication dated 31 August 1965, states that it has decided to withdraw its representatives from the Aden Joint Advisory Council indefinitely.

332. In these circumstances the Committee takes note of the Government's statement referred to in paragraph 330 above and requests it to be good enough to inform the Committee, as soon as possible, of further developments in the matter.

Allegations relating to the Application of the Penal Provisions of the Industrial Relations (Conciliation and Arbitration) Ordinance, 1960

333. At its meeting in February 1965 the Committee submitted definitive conclusions to the Governing Body, in paragraphs 85 to 91 of its 81st Report, in respect of a sedition case involving Mr. Abdulla Al Asnag, General Secretary of the Aden T.U.C., and his colleague, Mr. Idris Hambala. This matter is not, therefore, dealt with further in the present report.

334. In paragraphs 77 to 79 of its 81st Report the Committee referred to the application of the penal provisions of the Industrial Relations (Conciliation and Arbitration) Ordinance, 1960, in several specific cases arising out of strikes which occurred between October 1961 and December 1963. The Committee, having requested the Government to keep it informed of developments in connection with the question of amendment of the ordinance, took the view that it should continue to await the outcome of this more general aspect of the matter before submitting recommendations on the specific cases which had come before it. Again, in view of the fact that the Government has now stated that a Bill to repeal the ordinance and make other provision for industrial relations procedure in essential services will shortly be presented to the Legislative Council, and that the Committee is asking the Government to keep it informed of further developments in this matter, the Committee considers that it should defer its recommendations on these specific cases for the time being.

335. In paragraphs 80 to 84 of its 81st Report the Committee considered the case of Mr. Murshed, General Secretary of the General and Technical Workers' Union. The Committee observed that he had been found guilty by the court on a charge of sedition, but that this charge appeared to have been based essentially on his exhortations to contravene the ordinance, while other charges against him related to contraventions of the ordinance itself. For the same reasons as in the other cases before it, the Committee therefore deferred making its definitive recommendations on this particular case and, for the reasons now explained in paragraph 333 above, has again adjourned this aspect of the case.

Allegations relating to the Suppression of a Trade Union Newspaper

336. In paragraphs 270 to 273 of its 70th Report, paragraphs 170 to 176 of its 76th Report and paragraphs 92 and 93 of its 81st Report the Committee considered allegations relating to the suppression of the Aden T.U.C. newspaper, Al Ommal.

337. At its meeting in June 1964 the Committee had before it a communication from the Government dated 11 November 1963. In that communication, in reply to an earlier request to furnish extracts from Al Ommal on the basis of which its licence was revoked on the ground that it published subversive or seditious material, the Government declared that the revocation of the licence of the newspaper had not been caused by a single article or a single issue but had resulted from long continued misrepresentation of news and had been considered in conjunction with the security situation existing at the time. The Committee noted, in paragraph 175 of its 76th Report, that this reply added no new information to the general statement in an earlier reply that the newspaper had been suppressed for publishing subversive or seditious material,which, apparently, had not led to the prosecution of the editors of the newspaper. The Committee observed also that the Government did not comment on the allegation that the revocation of a newspaper's licence is entirely within the discretion of the public authority, without the right of appeal to a court of law, an allegation which, if it were well founded, the Committee pointed out, would appear to raise a question as to compatibility with the right of an organisation to organise its activities without interference on the part of the public authorities, pursuant to Article 3 of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), which had been declared applicable without modification to Aden.

338. In these circumstances the Committee, in paragraph 176 of its 76th Report, requested the Government to furnish fuller information on the matters referred to in the preceding paragraph. At its meeting in February 1965 the Committee, not having received the information in question, repeated this request in paragraph 93 of its 81st Report.

339. In its communication dated 26 May 1965 the Government states that it is the present policy of the Government of Aden that all applications for newspaper licences should receive similar treatment. The Government declares that recently licences have been issued by the Government of Aden on a liberal scale and are unlikely to be revoked, but that the revocation of a newspaper's licence is entirely within the discretion of the public authority and that there is no appeal to a court of law.

340. On a number of occasions in the past [1] the Committee has expressed the view that the right to express opinions through the press or otherwise is clearly one of the essential elements of trade union rights.

341. In the present case the following facts have now been ascertained. Firstly, Al Ommal was suppressed on the ground that it had been publishing subversive or seditious material. Secondly, the Government cannot furnish extracts from the said material because, it states, the reason for its suppression was based on its " misrepresentation " of news over a long period. Thirdly, the publication of the said material did not lead to the editor of the newspaper being prosecuted. Finally, the revocation of any newspaper's licence is entirely in the discretion of the public authorities with no right of appeal to the courts.

[1] See Second Report, Case No. 21 (New Zealand), para. 23; 12th Report, Case No. 75 (France-Madagascar), para. 290; 27th Report, Case No. 166 (Greece), para. 79; 33rd Report, Case No. 178 (United Kingdom-Aden), para. 57; 48th Report, Case No. 191 (Sudan), para. 81; 57th Report, Case No. 221 (United Kingdom-Aden), para. 94.

342. In these circumstances the Committee recommends the Governing Body—

(a) to draw the attention of the Government to the view which it has expressed on several occasions that the right to express opinions through the press or otherwise is clearly one of the essential elements of trade union rights;

(b) to note that revocation of the licence of the Aden T.U.C. newspaper, Al Ommal, was effected by public authorities in Aden in their discretion and without giving rise to any right of appeal to a court of law;

(c) to draw the attention of the Government to its view that this discretionary power of the public authorities in Aden is not compatible with the right of a trade union organisation to organise its activities without interference on the part of the public authorities pursuant to Article 3 of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), which has been declared applicable without modification to Aden;

(d) to request the Government to be good enough to inform the Governing Body of the measures it is intended to take to bring the legislation of Aden in this respect into conformity with Article 3 of the said Convention.

Allegations relating to the Banning of Public Meetings, Gatherings and Demonstrations

343. In its communication dated 13 June 1963 the Aden T.U.C. alleged that all public meetings, gatherings and public demonstrations were banned, that Government Notice No. 21 of 1963 prohibited the exhibition of symbols, placards or pictures on any building, public or private, and that the police had removed flags, pictures and other symbols from trade union buildings.

344. In its communication dated 6 November 1964 the Government stated that the measures contained in Government Notice No. 21 were of general application and not directed specifically at trade union activities and were not applied against trade unions to their disadvantage compared with other organisations.

345. At its meeting in February 1965 the Committee observed, in paragraph 95 of its 81st Report, that the Government had not commented on the allegations that all public meetings, gatherings and demonstrations were banned and that the police had removed flags, pictures and other symbols from trade union buildings, and therefore requested the Government to furnish its observations on these points.

346. In its communication dated 26 May 1965 the Government states that public meetings, processions and demonstrations normally require police permission under the Control of Meetings and Assemblies Regulations. During the existing state of emergency they are also governed by section 26 of the Emergency Decree, under which the Minister's power is delegated to the Commission of Police, but that it is not true to say that all public meetings, etc., are banned. With regard to the allegations concerning the removal of flags, pictures and other symbols from trade union buildings, states the Government, the police have acted solely pursuant to section 542 (1) of the Police Ordinance, which controls the exhibition of articles likely to lead to a disturbance of the public peace or the contempt of authority.

347. In the present case there is a general allegation that all public meetings, gatherings and demonstrations and the exhibition of symbols, placards and pictures on any building are banned, to which the Government replies that there is no general prohibition of public meetings, etc., but that they are subject in all cases to police permission, and that the law is applied to trade unions in the same way as other entities. Any removal of flags, etc., has been in accordance with powers of general application pursuant to provisions controlling the public exhibition of articles likely to lead to a disturbance of public peace or contempt of authority.

348. The allegations are of a somewhat general nature. No reference is made to the banning of any specific trade union meeting or demonstration, nor is any indication given of the nature of the symbols, etc., removed from trade union buildings. In these circumstances it is natural that the Government's reply should also be of a general nature, but this reply does assert that in no cases have trade unions been treated disadvantageously compared with other entities.

349. The Committee considers that the complainants have not furnished sufficient proof to show that the application of the measures referrred to have resulted in any specific infringement of trade union rights and therefore recommends the Governing Body to decide that these allegations do not call for further examination.

Allegations relating to Non-Recognition of Trade Union Rights in the States of the Federation of South Arabia

350. In its communication dated 6 April 1963 the Aden T.U.C. alleged that in the states of the Federation other than Aden trade unions were illegal and that the Aden Teachers' Union, recognised for the last seven years, was no longer recognised by the Federal Minister of Education because education concerned the whole Federation and not just the state of Aden. Since the formation of the Federation, said the complainants, other existing unions, as well as proposed new ones, were no longer recognised. Finally, it was alleged, employees in Abyan state who had asked for a revision of wages had been arrested.

351. In its communication dated 11 November 1963 the Government said that under the Constitution of the Federation labour matters were the responsibility of the individual states. In the states other than Aden life depended upon agriculture and there had been no demand for the formation of trade unions. " In fact ", said the Government, " there is no trade union organisation in these states but it would be a misinterpretation to claim that trade unions are illegal in these states."

352. The Government stated that the Aden Teachers' Union was a recognised union; in the past it had not sought recognition as a body with which the Aden Government, as an employer, should negotiate, although it had held informal discussions with the Education Department. On 6 February 1962 it applied for formal recognition and was requested to supply details of its constitution and membership. It had not replied to this request, but if it did reply, stated the Government, further consideration would be given to the question of recognition.

353. When it considered these allegations at its meeting in June 1964 the Committee noted, so far as the allegation that trade unions were illegal in the states of the Federation other than Aden was concerned, the Government's statement that " it would be a misinterpretation to claim that trade unions are illegal in these states ". The Committee, therefore, in paragraph 182 of its 76th Report, requested the Government to state " whether it would be correct to assume from the statement that workers in the states in question are legally entitled to form and join trade unions and carry on trade union activities if they wish to do so " and also asked the Government to furnish its observations on the allegation that employees in Abyan state who asked for a revision of wages were arrested.

354. At its meeting in February 1965 the Committee, not having received the further information and observations in question, repeated this request to the Government in paragraph 100 of its 81st Report.

355. In its communication dated 26 May 1965 the Government states that under the Constitution of the Federation of South Arabia labour matters are a state responsibility.

In the states other than Aden there is no law against trade unions. The Government explains, however, " that the concept of trade unionism is not at present reconcilable with the tribal organisation and social structure of the states of the Protectorate and that the creation of a climate in which trade unionism can function appropriately will necessarily be a slow and gradual process and is likely always to be extremely limited owing to the scattered distribution of the population and their dependence on agriculture ".

356. The Government declares that the agitation by state employees in Fadhli state for a revision of wages coincided with an investigation which was being undertaken into the causes of the general unrest existing in the state at the time, with the result that evidence of a subversive organisation directed and sustained from outside the state came to the notice of the authorities. Further investigation, says the Government, led to the discovery of seditious literature in the houses of two men—who were subsequently arrested—of a nature calculated to undermine law and order and to destroy the authority of the state, while other evidence was found of organised cells for subversive activity in the main centres of the state. In consequence the two men concerned, who were state employees, were arrested and prosecuted " on grounds on which any government would be bound to take action to maintain its authority ". The Government emphasises that neither these two men nor any other employees were arrested for agitating over wages revision.

357. With regard to the allegation that persons were arrested in Abyan state for asking for a wages increase, which is made in very general terms, the Government furnishes details to show that the state concerned was Fadhli state and that the arrests and prosecution of two public employees which took place in that state were not related to agitation by state employees in general for a wages revision but to a general wave of subversive activity in the state concerned. If the allegations had been more specific and substantiated in detail, the Committee might have considered it necessary to request the Government to furnish more detailed information on this aspect of the case. In the circumstances, however, the Committee considers that the complainants have not furnished sufficient proof in this particular connection of any infringement of trade union rights having taken place and recommends the Governing Body to decide that this aspect of the allegations does not call for further examination.

358. With regard to the allegations relating to the non-recognition of the Teachers' Union the position is not clear. It would appear that the Aden Teachers' Union is a registered union and that, when it sought formal recognition on 6 February 1962, it was asked to supply details of its constitution and membership—although it had in the past been recognised for the purpose of informal discussion—by the Education Department of the state of Aden, but had not supplied them. It is alleged, however, that recognition was refused to this union by the Federal Minister of Education because, since the formation of the Federation, education concerned the Federation and not just the state of Aden. It is further to be noted that in its reports pursuant to article 22 of the I.L.O. Constitution with respect to the application of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), the Government has referred to the Aden Teachers' Union as one of the " representative organisations " to which copies of its reports have been circulated.

359. In these circumstances, having regard to the obligation which the Government has assumed, under Article 3 of the Right of Association (Non-Metropolitan Territories) Convention, 1947 (No. 84), to ensure that all practical measures shall be taken to assure to trade unions which are representative of the workers concerned the right to conclude collective agreements with employers, the Committee requests the Government to be good enough to state whether the Aden Teachers' Union or any other union is now competent to negotiate on behalf of teachers in Aden and to comment on the allegation that recognition had been refused because education had become a federal matter.

360. There remains the allegation relating to the non-recognition of trade unions in states of the Federation other than Aden. To the specific question put by the Committee in paragraph 182 of its 76th Report (see paragraph 353 above) the Government replies that there is no law against trade unions in these states.

Allegations relating to the Employment (Registration and Control of Employment) Bill

361. These allegations were dealt with in detail by the Committee in paragraphs 183 to 196 of its 76th Report and paragraphs 101 to 104 of its 81st Report, when the Committee drew the attention of the Government, having regard to certain of the provisions of the Bill, to the guarantees and principles embodied in Articles 1 and 4 of the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), and Article 3 of the Right of Association (Non-Metropolitan Territories) Convention, 1947 (No. 84), both declared applicable without modification to Aden. The Committee also noted that it appeared from the text of the proposed Bill that, if it were to be enacted in that form, access to employment in general and to particular employments would depend on a worker being registered and that a wide discretion would be accorded to the registering authority when deciding to grant or refuse negotiation. The Committee pointed out, in paragraph 194 of its 76th Report, that it had drawn attention in the past [1] to the fact that such provisions may tend to prevent the negotiation by collective agreement of better terms and conditions, including terms and conditions governing access to particular employments, and thereby to infringe the rights of the workers concerned to bargain collectively and to promote and improve their working conditions, which are generally regarded as essential elements of freedom of association.

362. In these circumstances, at its meetings in June 1964 [2] and February 1965 [3], the Committee adjourned its examination of this aspect of the case and requested the Government to keep the Committee informed of further developments.

363. In its communication dated 26 May 1965 the Government states that the Bill remains in abeyance.

364. The Committee therefore requests the Government to be good enough to inform it in due course of any further developments in connection with the Employment (Registration and Control of Employment) Bill.

365. With regard to the case as a whole the Committee recommends the Governing Body—

(a) to decide, for the reasons indicated in paragraphs 348 and 349 above, that the allegations relating to the banning of public meetings, gatherings and demonstrations, and to the removal of flags, pictures and other symbols from trade union buildings do not call for further examination;

(b) to decide, for the reasons indicated in paragraph 357 above, that the allegations relating to the arrest of workers in Abyan state do not call for further examination;

(c) to decide, with regard to the allegations relating to the suppression of a trade union newspaper—

(i) to draw the attention of the Government to the view which it has expressed on several occasions that the right to express opinions through the press or otherwise is clearly one of the essential elements of trade union rights;

(ii) to note that revocation of the licence of the Aden T.U.C. newspaper, Al Ommal, was effected by the public authorities in Aden in their discretion and without giving rise to any right of appeal to a court of law;

[1] See 15th Report, Case No. 102 (Union of South Africa), paras. 160-165.

[2] See 76th Report, para. 196.

[3] See 81st Report, para. 104.

(iii) to draw the attention of the Government to its view that this discretionary power of the public authorities in Aden is not compatible with the right of a trade union organisation to organise its activities without interference on the part of the public authorities pursuant to Article 3 of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), which has been declared applicable without modification to Aden;

(iv) to request the Government to be good enough to inform the Governing Body of the measures it is intended to take to bring the legislation of Aden in this respect into conformity with Article 3 of the said Convention;

(d) to take note of the present interim report of the Committee with regard to the remaining allegations, it being understood that the Committee will report further thereon to the Governing Body when it has received additional information which it has decided to request the Government to be good enough to furnish.

Cases Nos. 294, 383, 397 and 400 :

Complaints Presented by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, the International Federation of Christian Trade Unions and the World Federation of Trade Unions against the Government of Spain

366. The Committee felt that it would be useful and appropriate to deal in a single document with the cases concerning Spain which it has under consideration and which relate to the various complaints presented.

367. Spain has not ratified the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), or the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98).

368. When the Committee last considered these cases at its 38th Session (November 1964) it submitted to the Governing Body provisional reports thereon which appear in its 78th Report [1], and which were approved by the Governing Body at its 160th Session (November 1964).

369. The Government has supplied additional information in communications dated 4 February and 11 September 1965. The Committee has also obtained information on certain questions relating to the trade union situation in Spain and the texts of some of the judicial decisions requested, through the permanent delegate of Spain accredited to the international organisations in Geneva.

370. The information supplied by the Government on certain questions relating to the trade union situation in Spain, and the allegations which are still pending, are examined by the Committee in the following paragraphs.

Councils of Workers and Councils of Employers

371. The Committee has indicated on previous occasions [2] that workers should have the right to establish and join organisations of their own choosing without previous authorisation, and that these organisations should have the right to elect their representatives freely. The Government now indicates that the social sections (workers) and the economic sections (employers) of the Spanish trade union organisation have been progressively acquiring independence as regards the negotiation—and/or the nomination of representatives with a view to the negotiation—of collective agreements, this evolution having culminated in the internal regulations of the trade union organisations by means of which councils of workers and councils of employers were set up (Orders Nos. 90 and 91 of 5 November 1964). These councils, which work in plenary and as permanent bodies and which exist both at the provincial and the national levels, are defined and act as " organs for expression, representation and inter-union co-ordination of workers' general and common interests " (Order No. 90 respecting workers' councils, section 1), or ". . . of employers' general and common interests " (Order No. 91 concerning employers' councils, section 1). Through these councils the employers and the workers enjoy a new means of expression in regard to problems which, being of a general and common interest, affect either all employers as such or all workers as such, whereas questions relating specifically to their sector or branch of activity will continue to be dealt with as in the past by the economic section—as regards employers—and by the social section—as regards workers—of the trade union to which they belong. The provincial councils of employers and of workers which began to be set up in March 1965 are now working normally. The National Council of Workers was established in Valencia on 29 June 1965, and the National Council of Employers was set up in Barcelona on 25 October 1965. Over 7 million workers democratically elected their representatives, both at the provincial level and at the national level, with a view to the establishment of the National Council of Workers. The President of the National Council of Workers has obtained 135 votes from the 273 electors present and voting, other candidates having obtained 89, 27 and 20 votes respectively.

372. The Committee notes, in addition, that section 7 of Order No. 90 concerning workers' councils provides that " the presidents and vice-presidents of provincial workers' councils shall be elected, from amongst the presidents of the social sections of the provincial trade union bodies, by the corresponding plenary assemblies at their first session and shall be proposed to the Provincial Delegate of Trade Unions, who will then appoint them in his capacity as President of the Provincial Trade Union Council "; the Committee also notes that section 13 of this same text provides that " the President and two Vice-Presidents of the National Council of Workers shall be elected from amongst the members of the Permanent Commission, by its plenary assembly at its first session, and shall be proposed to the National Delegate of Trade Unions, who will then appoint them ".

373. Having regard to these facts, the Committee recommends the Governing Body to take note of the creation of the councils of workers and councils of employers, which may constitute a preliminary step towards the setting up of independent workers' and employers' organisations, freely established by the workers and by the employers respectively, and that it suggest to the Government the advisability of taking further steps in the direction already being followed with a view to ensuring that all the offices in the councils of workers, without exception, shall be occupied by persons freely elected by all Spanish workers without any disqualification based on their part in or attitude towards past events.

Amendment of Article 222 of the Penal Code

374. The Committee has pointed out on various occasions [1] that certain legislative provisions, including in particular section 222 of the Penal Code, could be interpreted as an absolute prohibition of strikes. The Government now states that in June 1965 it approved and submitted to the Cortes a draft amendment of section 222 of the Penal Code. Section 222 in its present form reads as follows:

The following shall be punished as guilty of sedition:

(1) officials and employees responsible for all types of public services and individuals who, in a professional capacity, render services recognised as essential and incapable of postponement and who, for the purpose of making an attempt against the security of the State, of upsetting its normal activity or of prejudicing its authority or reputation, cease work or impair the regularity of the service;

[1] See 30th Report, Case No. 143 (Spain), paras. 125-131; 41st Report, Case No. 143 (Spain), paras. 81-88; 49th Report, Case No. 143 (Spain), paras. 100-102; 66th Report, Case No. 294 (Spain), paras. 480-484.

(2) combinations of employers for the purpose of paralysing work;

(3) strikes by workers.

Section 222, with the proposed amendment, would read as follows:

The following shall be punished as guilty of sedition:

(1) officials, employees and individuals responsible for rendering any kind of public services recognised as essential and incapable of postponement who cease their activities or in any way impair the regularity of the service;

(2) employers and workers who, with the object of making an attempt against the security of the State, of upsetting its normal activity, or of prejudicing its authority or reputation, cease or change the regularity of the work.

375. According to the Government, this text is being examined in plenary by the competent committee in the Cortes, with a view to its final approval at the next session of the Cortes.

376. Having regard to these facts, the Committee recommends the Governing Body to take note of the proposed amendment to section 222 of the Penal Code, according to which strikes and lockouts are no longer included amongst the acts which constitute offences of sedition, but to point out the danger of the wording employed in clause 2 of the proposed amendment being interpreted in broad terms as prohibiting all types of strike, and to suggest that due regard should be paid to this fact in the formulation by the Cortes of the final text, so as to exclude, without any doubt whatever, from the acts considered as offences of sedition any strikes which might be promoted by workers with a view to furthering and defending their occupational interests.

Collective Agreements

377. The Committee has made a number of comments [1], as regards the system of collective agreements, on the question of the approval of these agreements by the government authorities. The Government now states in this respect that the system governing the regulation of wages, hours of work and other conditions of work has evolved from one of government regulation to one based on free collective agreements and that the success and gradual development of the new system is not open to doubt. As of 1 January 1965, 4,736 collective agreements had been concluded in the last few years in very different sectors, affecting 7,820,822 workers and 1,445,226 undertakings. These agreements were freely concluded by the employers and workers. According to the Government, the approval of agreements by the labour authorities has no purpose other than to ascertain whether there are any major irregularities of form which invalidate them; moreover, it also performs the extremely important function of raising collective agreements (for purposes of citation and use in courts of law) from the status of a mere contractual fact to that of an instrument having the effect of a rule of law; this greatly facilitates the agreement being adduced as evidence and eliminates the burden of proof concerning its contents and reality, since agreements are immediately published in the provincial or state official bulletins. Out of the 4,736 collective agreements it has been considered necessary to submit only 33 for consideration by the Government's Committee for Economic Affairs, and only three have been rejected.

378. The Committee considers that, bearing in mind the fact that in practice only three of the 33 agreements submitted to it, out of a total of 4,736, have been rejected by the Government's Committee for Economic Affairs, present circumstances would be propitious for the examination by the Government of the possibility of replacing the procedure for the approval of collective agreements, in its present form, by the creation of a system of registration of all collective agreements negotiated in accordance with the terms of the law, so that the simple registration of a collective agreement may have the same effect as now results from government approval; nevertheless, in the case of certain collective agreements the terms of which appeared to conflict with considerations of general interest, it might be possible to envisage a procedure whereby the attention of the parties could be drawn to these considerations to enable them to examine the matter further, it being understood that the final decision thereon should rest with the parties. The setting up of a system of this sort would be in conformity with the principle that trade unions must enjoy the right to endeavour to improve, by means of collective bargaining, the conditions of living and of work of their members and that the authorities must abstain from any interference which might limit this right.

379. In these circumstances the Committee recommends the Governing Body—

(a) to take note of the increasing number of collective agreements concluded in Spain as a means of regulating conditions of work for a constantly increasing number of workers;

(b) to suggest to the Government that it examine the possibility of replacing the procedure for the approval of collective agreements, in its present form, by the creation of a system for the registration of all collective agreements negotiated in accordance with the terms of the law;

(c) to point out, nevertheless, that, in the case of certain collective agreements the terms of which appeared to conflict with considerations of general interest, it might be possible to envisage a procedure whereby the attention of the parties could be drawn to these considerations to enable them to examine the matter further, it being understood that the final decision thereon should rest with the parties.

Jurisdiction in regard to Public Order

380. The Committee referred in its 74th and 76th Reports [1] to the changes made in the jurisdiction in regard to public order.

381. According to the supplementary information now supplied by the Government the Act of 2 December 1963 established the Jurisdiction and Court of Public Order. This Act deals explicitly with the jurisdiction formerly assigned to the military courts. Many cases in which proceedings had been instituted prior to the entry into force of the new Act have been transferred to the new Jurisdiction and Court of Public Order and removed from the jurisdiction of the military courts. The Court of Public Order is alone competent, throughout the national territory, to deal with offences commonly referred to as political or contrary to the security of the State, for instance unlawful associations, illegal propaganda, offences against the internal security of the State and offences against the external security of the State. According to the Government the military courts remain competent exclusively with respect to acts of terrorism. The judicial authorities competent with regard to public order consist of a Jurisdiction and Court within the system or ordinary courts and with exclusive competence vis-à-vis other jurisdictions and courts within that system. The Court consists of a president and two magistrates who are career judges. With respect to procedure the Act provides that the Court and Jurisdiction must conform strictly to the provisions of the Act respecting ordinary criminal procedure. Judgments are delivered orally and publicly in a special room of the Madrid Territorial Court of Appeal. The representatives of and counsel for the defence are also governed by the rules of ordinary jurisdiction. Appeals against the judgments given by the Court of Public Order may be lodged with the Second Chamber of the Supreme Court of Justice. The Court and Jurisdiction of Public Order have been in operation since 5 February 1964. Up to 31 December 1964 the Jurisdiction of Public Order had examined 267 cases, of which a fair number had already been instituted either with the ordinary courts or the military courts before the Act establishing the jurisdiction of public order came into force. Jurisdiction in these cases was accordingly removed from these bodies. During its first year the Court of Public Order gave 128 judgments, of which approximately 35 per cent. resulted in release. As of June 1965 52 judgments had been given.

382. In these circumstances the Committee recommends the Governing Body to take note of the Government's statement that the military courts remain competent exclusively with respect to acts of terrorism.

Allegations concerning Arrests Arising out of the 1962 Strikes

383. The Committee observed, at its 38th Session (November 1964), that, of the 47 persons originally sentenced in connection with the 1962 strikes, 43 had subsequently been set free, but that Mr. Gregorio Rodríguez Gordon, Mr. Ramón Ormazábal Tife, Mr. Antonio Jiménez Pericás and Mr. Agustín Ibarrola Giocoechea were still in prison. It requested the Government to be good enough to keep it informed about any measures that might be taken concerning these persons.

384. In its communication of 4 February 1965 the Government states that the terms of imprisonment imposed on the above-mentioned persons would expire at dates running from 13 June 1969 to 13 June 1978, but that, with the remission which could be granted if they sought the benefit of the amnesty, they could be released conditionally on dates running from 27 May 1965 to 1 February 1971.

385. In the circumstances the Committee recommends the Governing Body to take note of the information furnished by the Government and to ask the Government to continue to keep the matter under review and to be good enough to keep it informed as to any measures that may be taken concerning Mr. Ramón Ormazábal Tife, Mr. Gregorio Rodríguez Gordon, Mr. Antonio Jiménez Pericas and Mr. Agustín Ibarrola Goicoechea.

Allegations concerning the 1963 Strikes

386. Although the allegations made by I.C.F.T.U. and I.F.C.T.U. on 24 September 1963 referred only to various acts of persecution and violence arising out of a labour dispute, without supplying any further details about the persons injured thereby, the additional information supplied in the letter of 8 October 1963 gave a number of details, such as the names of the persons alleged to have been ill-treated and tortured (one of whom was stated to have died as a result), together with the assertion that sanctions had been applied to firms which hired workers who had taken part in the strikes.

387. In its communication of 4 February 1965 the Government states that the careful investigations made at that time showed clearly that the allegations of torture and violence were pure fabrications, since it had been fully proved that there had been no case of death or ill-treatment as alleged. The Government adds that it must state categorically that no miner has died as a result of ill-treatment and that there has never been any prisoner named Rafael González (who, according to the complainants, had died). As regards the other persons mentioned in the allegations, the Government denies that anyone named Silvino Zapico has ever been arrested and states that no person of that name is known in the district concerned, nor is there any trace of such a person in the admission records of any hospital. As regards Mr. Vicente Baragaño García, the Government states that he was arrested on 10 August 1963 and placed at the disposal of the competent judicial authorities on grave suspicion of subversive activities outside the scope of trade union affairs, and that, when examined by the doctors of the Carabanchel prison, where he was being held at that time, he bore no trace of the torture alleged to have been inflicted on him. As regards Mr. Everardo Lastra Pérez, the Government states that he was arrested in 1962 for Communist activities and that, since he already showed symptoms of mental derangement at that time, he was sent to the Oviedo psychiatric hospital; on 10 May 1963 he was again arrested for activities unrelated to labour matters and again sent to the above-mentioned provincial psychiatric hospital because he showed the same marked symptoms of insanity. With respect to the remaining allegations, the Government states that they were either shown also to be unfounded or that they could not be investigated by the Attorney-General's Office because, even if they had been true, they would have related to presumed crimes in regard to which proceedings could have been instituted only at the request of a party legitimately concerned.

388. The Committee notes that, while the complainants allege that certain persons, whose names they mention, were subjected to ill-treatment and torture as a result of which one of them died, the Government categorically denies that this is so and indeed that certain of the persons named had been arrested at any time. In view of these two entirely contradictory statements and the scant information at its disposal, the Committee finds it impossible to reach any final conclusion based on full knowledge of the facts.

389. In the circumstances the Committee recommends the Governing Body to take note of the fact that, for the reasons indicated in paragraph 388 above, it is unable to submit final conclusions to the Governing Body concerning the allegations pending with respect to the 1963 strikes.

Allegations respecting the Arrest of Mr. José María Rodríguez Manzano

390. At its 38th Session (November 1964) the Committee noted that Mr. Rodríguez Manzano had been sentenced by the Court of Public Order because of activities which, according to the complainants, were of a trade union character but which the Government described as political. In accordance with its usual practice the Committee recommended the Governing Body to ask the Government to forward a copy of the verdict and of the reasons adduced therein, together with any other information which might be helpful to the Committee.

391. In its communication of 11 September 1965 the Government insists once again that the activities attributed to Mr. Rodríguez Manzano were political in character; it adds that this is confirmed by the statements of the leaders of the clandestine political movement against the Spanish State, who avow and proclaim their intention of making use of such conflicts as a means of preparing subversion by violence within the structure of the State. This same political character, according to the Government, is reflected in all the activities of the so-called Workers' Trade Union Alliance and the Basque Workers' Solidarity Movement (S.T.V.). The Government indicates that the Basque Nationalist party itself, through its publication Euzko Gaztedi, confirms the claim that S.T.V. is a group belonging to the Basque Nationalist party. The Government adds that proof of the political character of S.T.V. may be found in several statements, drawn from different numbers of Lan Deya (clandestine news sheet, five or six numbers of which were brought out, according to the sentence, by Mr. Rodríguez Manzano during the summer of 1963, in Pasajes (Guipúzcoa)). The extracts communicated by the Government are as follows: " It is not necessary to recall that the régime is unlawful as to its origin and, accordingly, in its working " (Lan Deya, No. 9). " S.T.V. understands the situation and its line is firmly established; it is only by clandestine measures that our objectives can be achieved. . . . Nevertheless participation in this revolutionary work does not imply necessarily that the Basque brotherhood renounces all lawful opportunities of finding a solution for the worker " (ibid., No. 11). " The Basque country is subject to nationalist domination. The economic policy, demography, class organisation, racial, linguistic and cultural discrimination, and the exploitation of the Basque workers prevent the development and even the mere survival of Basque civilisation, and hence any truly original, free and individual contribution of the Basque genius to universal society and culture. French and Spanish nationalism, ' the enemy of separatism ', divides a single nation made up of 2 million persons by a frontier whose only raison d'être lies in arbitrary colonialism " (ibid., No. 21).

392. The Committee has also obtained, through the good offices of the permanent delegate of Spain accredited to the international organisations in Geneva, a copy of the sentence handed down by the Court of Public Order in the case against Mr. Rodríguez Manzano and a copy of the sentence given by the Supreme Court on 12 May 1965 by which it rejected the appeal which had been made by Mr. Rodríguez Manzano for breach of form and violation of the law.

393. It appears from the grounds given in the sentence that the deeds which are stated to have been proved are legally made up of the offences of unlawful association, illegal propaganda and clandestine entry into the national territory. Accordingly, Mr. Rodríguez Manzano was condemned to various terms of imprisonment corresponding to the different offences which were proven.

394. The Committee notes that two of the three offences of which Mr. Rodríguez Manzano was found guilty may be related to the exercise of trade union rights: those relating to unlawful association and illegal propaganda. The Committee also notes that the person concerned was judged by the Court of Public Order, which is the only court competent to consider political offences, which is composed of a chairman and of two career magistrates drawn from the judicial profession and in which the prosecution is represented by officials of the Public Prosecutor's Office. The Committee also notes that the judgment against Mr. Rodríguez Manzano was delivered orally and publicly, that the person concerned was able to appeal to the Second Chamber of the Supreme Court of Justice against the sentence and that this appeal was rejected, by decision dated 12 May 1965.

395. The Committee considers that, although it cannot be categorically concluded from the sentences in question—in which reference is made solely to the offences of unlawful association and illegal propaganda—that the alleged activities are not related to the exercise of trade union rights, it would appear that the acts of Mr. Rodríguez Manzano exceeded in some ways the normal framework of trade union activities as such.

396. The Committee therefore recommends the Governing Body to note that Mr. Rodríguez Manzano appealed to the Supreme Court, which confirmed the sentence, and to request the Government to be good enough to keep it informed in the event of any further developments in the matter.

Allegations relating to the Arrest of Workers Belonging to the Workers' Committee of Vizcaya

397. By a joint communication of 28 April 1964 I.C.F.T.U. and I.F.C.T.U. stated that the workers Valeriano Gómez Lavín, Ricardo Basarte Amézaga, Agustín José Begona Sánchez y Corrales, José María Echevarría Heppe and David Morín Salgado, members of the Workers' Committee of Vizcaya elected by the workers of Bilbao to negotiate with the authorities regarding the reinstatement of 52 workers who were dismissed during the strikes of the spring of 1962 had been arrested. Subsequently, in a letter of 15 May 1964, the complainants stated that the said persons had been released. On 29 October 1964 I.C.F.T.U. and I.F.C.T.U. stated that these members of the Workers' Committee of Vizcaya had been tried on 16 October 1964 by the Court of Public Order in Madrid and each had been sentenced to six months' imprisonment.

398. In its communication of 11 June 1964 the Government stated that it was not correct that the five persons detained were members of a workers' committee and had been elected by the workers of Bilbao. The cause of their detention was not the fact that they claimed a representative function, but their active participation in unlawful acts with the object of disturbing and obstructing the free expression of the workers' wishes in elections. These persons, the Government continued, were placed at the disposal of the appropriate ordinary courts of law, which then decided on their release.

399. The Committee, at its 38th Session (November 1964), requested the Government to supply information on the contradiction which appeared to exist between the statements communicated and, in any case, to supply the text of the sentences imposed on the persons in question and the reasons adduced therein.

400. By their communication of 19 January 1965 I.C.F.T.U. and I.F.C.T.U. transmitted the text of the judgment of the Court of Public Order against the members of the above-mentioned Committee, a copy of which was forwarded to the Government.

401. In its communication of 11 September 1965 the Government states that there was no contradiction between the statement, made in its reply of 11 June 1964 and repeated in its reply of 14 October 1964, that these five persons were at liberty, and the fact that they were subsequently tried by the competent court of law, since under any procedural system the fact of being charged with an offence and the fact of being at liberty until the matter comes before a court are perfectly compatible and indeed this coincidence frequently occurs —as it did in the present case. The Government adds that, according to judgment cited by I.C.F.T.U. and I.F.C.T.U., the accused had been provisionally detained by order of the judicial authority on 24 April 1964 and—also provisionally—released on bail on 13 May 1964 until, after the case had been heard, they were sentenced to six months' imprisonment, the period of preventive detention being deducted from the sentence to be served. The Government further states that at the time of the drafting of the reply (11 September 1965) the persons mentioned above were still provisionally at liberty—having appealed to the Supreme Court of Justice against their sentences—until the Supreme Court gave its ruling on the matter. Finally, the Government states that the sentence is equally explicit in the first part of the factual preamble to the sentence where the court found that the persons in question had, apart from other activities, agreed to " boycott trade union elections by refraining from participating in the election of leaders ".

402. The Committee takes note of the Government's statement, which clears up an apparent contradiction between the statements made by the complainants and those of the Government as to whether or not the five persons in question were at liberty.

403. As regards the other point in regard to which the Committee had asked for certain explanations, that is the statement that " these persons were arrested for taking part in unlawful acts, with the object of preventing the free expression of the workers' wishes in elections ", the Committee notes that the Government indicates that the reply may be found in the first part of the preamble to sentence of the Court of Public Order, in which it is stated that the persons concerned, apart from other activities, had agreed to " boycott the trade union elections by refraining from participating in the election of leaders ".

404. The Committee considers that the mere call addressed to workers to abstain from participating in trade union elections does not necessarily imply any intention of obstructing the free expression of workers' wishes in elections, unless the call is accompanied or followed by coercive activities such as to disturb or obstruct the exercise of these trade union rights.

405. The Committee also notes that the persons in question are still at liberty pending their appeal to the Supreme Court against the sentence handed down.

406. Accordingly the Committee recommends the Governing Body to note that the workers belonging to the Workers' Committee of Vizcaya are at liberty pending their appeal to the Supreme Court against the sentence, to request the Government to communicate the judgment of the said court on the question, and to decide in the meantime to postpone its examination of this aspect of the case.

Allegations relating to the Verdicts against Three Trade Union Leaders

407. The complainants stated in their original allegation that three trade union leaders, Francisco Calle, Agustín Mariano and José Cases, were arrested and brought before the courts for their trade union activities. They indicated subsequently that severe sentences had been handed down against them. The Government, for its part, stated that the persons in question had been arrested not because of trade union activities, but because of subversive political activities and unlawful association, as they had been seeking to disrupt by violence the established order of the Spanish State, and that the court had issued its decision on 6 August 1964 finding the accused guilty of the offences of unlawful association and of subversive propaganda, as defined and declared punishable in the Penal Code.

408. At its 38th Session (November 1964) the Committee noted that the Government had sent no information on the specific acts motivating the sentences in question and recommended the Governing Body to request the Government to communicate the texts of any judgments given and their grounds and, in any case, information on the facts which led to the indictment.

409. In its communication of 4 February 1965 the Government repeated the information already supplied and added that it trusted that the objectivity of the Committee would prevent the danger of its maintaining artificially alive an irrelevant problem for which there had never been the least foundation.

410. The Committee regrets that the Government has not replied in concrete terms to the request for additional information, the purpose of which had been merely to obtain all the necessary information so as to enable the Committee to reach a fully informed and objective decision. The Committee hopes that the Government will find it possible to supply the information in question, as it has already done in regard to other similar questions examined by the Committee (see paragraph 392).

411. By a communication of 22 March 1965 I.F.C.T.U. stated that at the beginning of February the Supreme Court confirmed the sentences against the three trade unionists.

412. In these circumstances the Committee recommends the Governing Body to request the Government once more, in view of the lack of information on the acts leading to the sentences of Mr. Francisco Calle, Mr. Agustín Mariano and Mr. José Cases, to be good enough to communicate the text of the judgments pronounced against these persons, or, in any case, information on the acts that led to their trial, and to decide in the meantime to postpone further examination of this aspect of the case.

Allegations respecting the Arrest of Workers in connection with the Strikes of 1964

413. At its 38th Session (November 1964) the Committee examined the allegations regarding the arrest of workers in Bilbao, Sabadell and the Asturian mines in connection with a number of strikes. The Government had stated in its reply that some of these persons were at the disposal of the competent civil courts, charged with secret and unlawful political activities and unlawful association. In these circumstances the Committee, in accordance with its usual practice, had recommended the Governing Body to ask the Government to supply the texts of the judgments given and their grounds.

414. In its communication of 11 September 1965 the Government repeats the information given in its previous communications and does not therefore introduce any new element which would enable the Committee to proceed with the examination of this aspect of the case.

415. In these circumstances the Committee recommends the Governing Body to ask the Government once again to communicate the texts of any judgments given and their grounds, as well as any other element which might be supplied regarding the activities of the persons in question, and to decide in the meantime to postpone its examination of this aspect of the case.

416. With regard to the case as a whole the Committee recommends the Governing Body—

(1) as regards the information furnished by the Government on various questions relating to trade union rights in Spain—

(a) to take note of the creation of the councils of workers and councils of employers, which may constitute a preliminary step towards the setting up of independent workers' and employers' organisations, freely established by the workers and by the employers respectively, and to suggest the advisability of taking further steps in the direction already being followed, with a view to ensuring that all the offices in the councils of workers, without exception, shall be occupied by persons freely elected by all Spanish workers, without any disqualification based on their part in or attitude towards past events;

(b) (i) to take note of the proposed amendment to section 222 of the Penal Code, according to which strikes and lockouts are no longer included amongst the acts which constitute offences of sedition;

(ii) to point out the danger of the wording employed in clause 2 of the proposed amendment being interpreted in broad terms as prohibiting all types of strike, and to suggest that due regard be paid to this fact in the formulation by the Cortes of the final text, so as to exclude, without any doubt whatever, from the acts considered as offences of sedition, any strikes which might be promoted by workers with a view to furthering and defending their occupational interests;

(c) (i) to take note of the increasing number of collective agreements concluded in Spain as a means of regulating conditions of work for a constantly increasing number of workers;

(ii) to suggest to the Government that it examine the possibility of replacing the procedure for the approval of collective agreements, in its present form, by the creation of a system for the registration of all collective agreements negotiated in accordance with the terms of the law;

(iii) to point out, nevertheless, that, in the case of certain collective agreements the terms of which appeared to conflict with considerations of general interest, it might be possible to envisage a procedure whereby the attention of the parties could be drawn to these considerations to enable them to examine the matter further, it being understood that the final decision thereon should rest with the parties;

(d) to take note of the Government's statement that the military courts remain competent exclusively with respect to acts of terrorism;

(2) as regards the allegations relating to the strikes of 1963, to take note of the fact that, for the reasons indicated in paragraph 388 above, the Committee is unable to submit final conclusions to the Governing Body;

(3) as regards the allegations relating to the arrest of Mr. José María Rodríguez Manzano, to note that the person concerned appealed to the Supreme Court, which confirmed the sentence, and to request the Government to be good enough to keep it informed in the event of any further developments in the matter;

(4) as regards the allegations relating to arrests arising out of the 1962 strikes, to take note of the information furnished by the Government, and to ask the Government to continue to keep the matter under review and to be good enough to keep it informed as to any measures that may be taken concerning Mr. Ramón Ormazábal Tife, Mr. Gregorio Rodríguez Gordon, Mr. Antonio Jiménez Pericas and Mr. Agustín Ibarrola Goicoechea;

(5) to note that the workers belonging to the Workers' Committee of Vizcaya are now at liberty pending their appeal;

(6) to request the Government to be good enough to furnish the texts, together with the reasons adduced, of the judgments concerning—

(a) the sentencing of Messrs. Francisco Calle, Agustín Mariano and José Cases;

(b) the appeals to the Supreme Court against the sentence lodged by the workers belonging to the Workers' Committee of Vizcaya;

(c) the workers arrested in connection with the strikes of 1964;

(7) to take note of the present interim report, it being understood that the Committee will report further to the Governing Body when the information requested from the Government has been received.

Case No. 335 :

Complaints Presented by the Peruvian Workers' Confederation against the Government of Peru

417. The Committee examined this case previously at its 39th Session (February 1965) and submitted an interim report that appears in paragraphs 57 to 64 of its 82nd Report, which was approved by the Governing Body at its 161st Session (March 1965).

418. The complainants of the Peruvian Workers' Confederation (C.T.P.) are contained in a communication dated 10 May 1963, in another dated 21 May 1963, forwarded by the Secretary-General of the United Nations, and in a third dated 3 June 1963. At each of its sessions in November 1963, February 1964, June 1964 and November 1964 the Committee decided to postpone consideration of this case, since it was awaiting the observations of the Government, which were finally received with a communication dated 5 January 1965. When it examined the case at its February 1965 Session the Committee observed that the Government in its reply did not mention the specific complaints of C.T.P. but referred to the observations that had been made on an earlier case concerning different facts. The Committee in paragraph 64 of its 82nd Report therefore recommended the Governing Body to request the Government to furnish its observations on the specific complaints.

419. The Government sent these observations with a communication dated 10 September 1965.

420. Peru has ratified the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), and the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98).

Allegations respecting a Legislative Draft to Amend the Penal Code

421. In their communications of 10 and 21 May 1963 the complainants declare that they reject a legislative draft that would infringe freedom of association. According to the text of the draft, which has been published in the press and a copy of which accompanies the complaint, its purpose is to make various additions to the Penal Code. One section aims at establishing so-called offences against freedom to work and lays down penalties of imprisonment for persons who resort to violence in order to compel another person to take part in a strike or prevent him from entering his workplace and also for the employer or employee who practises coercion to compel another person to take part in a lockout or to leave or join a workers' or employers' organisation. Another section provides penalties of imprisonment for workers and officials in the service of the State or of public bodies who collectively cease work.

422. In its communication of 10 September 1965 the Government states that the cause of the complaint no longer exists since the draft in question has not become law. In fact, it was a draft legislative decree that was under consideration during the previous régime, when the executive was invested with legislative powers. The present Government issued Act No. 15060 of 19 June 1964 to set up the Committee for Drafting the Labour Code. The Government adds that this Committee is sitting and that its work will cover questions relating to freedom of association.

423. In these circumstances the Committee recommends the Governing Body to take note of the statement of the Government and to decide that there would be no object in examining this aspect of the case further.

Allegations relating to Presidential Decree No. 009 Governing the Formation of Trade Union Organisations

424. In its communication dated 3 June 1963 C.T.P. states that many provisions of Presidential Decree No. 009 of 3 May 1961, governing the formation of trade union organisations, infringe the principles set forth in the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87). The complainants enclose a copy of the decree with their letter and make detailed comments on those of its provisions which they consider to infringe freedom of association. In the following paragraphs the Committee analyses this series of allegations, as well as the observations made on them by the Government in its communication of 10 September 1965.

(a) Allegation relating to the Right Not to Join a Trade Union.

425. C.T.P. alleges that section 4 of Presidential Decree No. 009, which provides that nobody shall be compelled to join or not to join a trade union, introduces into Peruvian legislation a principle that was rejected by the I.L.O. when the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention (No. 98), was being worked out. C.T.P. adds that, at the two sessions of the International Labour Conference during which the question was studied, three amendments submitted by the Employers' members with the object of incorporating the principle of the right not to join a union in Article 1 of Convention No. 98 were rejected. For this reason, and because the principle in question is not to be found in Convention No. 87, C.T.P. concludes that it is not proper to include it in the decree giving effect to the latter Convention, which has been ratified by Peru.

426. The Government asserts that this objection is baseless, since section 4 of the decree is in full harmony with article 27 of the Peruvian Constitution, which establishes the right to freedom of association. The Government adds that no Article of Convention No. 87 authorises, or can authorise, anybody to compel workers to join or not join a union.

427. In the past the Committee has had to examine a number of cases in which legislation has authorised or prohibited the establishment through collective agreements or other voluntary means of union security clauses. In such cases [1] the Committee has rejected the allegations made, reasoning on the basis of the declarations contained in the report [2] of the Committee on Industrial Relations set up by the International Labour Conference at its 32nd Session in 1949 to the effect that the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), could in no way be interpreted as authorising or prohibiting union security arrangements, such questions being matters for regulation in accordance with national practice. Since the Conference accepted this opinion in adopting the report of the Committee on Industrial Relations, the Committee considers that the provision of section 4 of Presidential Decree No. 009 referred to by the complainants does not in itself infringe Convention No. 98, which has been ratified by Peru, or Convention No. 87, which does not refer to the question either.

428. In these circumstances the Committee recommends the Governing Body to decide that there would be no object in examining this aspect of the case further.

(b) Allegation relating to the Prohibition of Political Activities by Trade Unions.

429. C.T.P. alleges that section 6 of the decree (which prohibits trade unions from devoting themselves as organised bodies to political or religious activities or economic activities with a gainful purpose) conflicts with Convention No. 87. The Government replies that the restriction is applicable to party politics, which imply the blind acceptance of certain specific lines to the detriment of the union itself, and adds that political action is related to the cultural structure of society. The restriction is based on a full and direct appreciation of the Peruvian situation. Moreover, the Government goes on, the provision in question is in harmony with the resolution concerning the independence of the trade union movement, adopted by the International Labour Conference at its 35th Session in 1952. In conclusion, the Government states that political aims, which presuppose party loyalty, are damaging to the internal cohesion of trade unions and to the achievement of their true aims, and uses this argument to justify the prohibition contained in section 6 of the decree.

430. The Committee observes that neither the complainant nor the Government bases its arguments on the aspects of section 6 devoted to religious activities or to " economic activities with a gainful purpose ". With regard to the political activity of trade unions, the resolution concerning the independence of the trade union movement adopted by the International Labour Conference at its 35th Session (Geneva, June 1952) states in particular that when trade unions undertake political action or participate in it, this action should not be " of such a nature as to compromise the continuance of the trade union movement or its social and economic functions irrespective of political changes in the country ".

431. The Committee nevertheless recalls in this connection words used by the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations in 1959 to the effect that a general prohibition against all political activity by trade unions may raise difficulties, since the interpretation given to the relevant provisions in practice may change at any moment and restrict considerably the possibility of action of the organisations.[1]

432. In these circumstances the Committee recalls the principle that it has maintained in various earlier cases, particularly Case No. 423 relating to Honduras [2], that it is not appropriate to prohibit all political activities by occupational organisations in general terms, but that the judicial authorities should be entrusted with the task of pronouncing on abuses that might be committed by organisations that had lost sight of the fact that their fundamental objective, according to the resolution concerning the independence of the trade union movement adopted by the Conference in 1952, is " the economic and social advancement of the workers ".

433. In these circumstances the Committee recommends the Governing Body to draw the attention of the Government to the importance it attaches to the principle set forth in paragraph 432 above, to suggest to the Government the desirability of studying any reforms that may be necessary to give full expression to this principle, and to express the hope that such reforms will be introduced as soon as possible, perhaps with the promulgation of the Labour Code whose drafting is announced by the Government.

(c) Allegations relating to the Minimum Number of Members in a Trade Union.

434. The complainants allege that section 7 of the decree, by requiring a minimum of 20 members for the formation or continuance of a workers' trade union, restricts the scope of Article 2 of Convention No. 87, according to which workers and employers, without distinction whatsoever, shall have the right to establish organisations of their own choosing without previous authorisation. C.T.P. adds that this section of the decree also improperly limits the representation of the workers to one delegate in those workplaces that have five or more workers but do not reach the minimum number fixed for the establishment of a trade union. Both provisions, besides conflicting with the Convention, constitute retrograde measures in Peruvian legislation, since the Presidential Decree of 23 March 1936, which is rescinded where it conflicts with Presidential Decree No. 009, required no minimum number of members and provided, moreover, that, in the absence of a trade union, workers could be represented by two delegates. The complainants assert that workers employed in establishments with fewer than 20 employees, which are very numerous in Peru, were able before the promulgation of Decree No. 009 to establish trade union committees or trade unions that were affiliated to trade unions or federations respectively, such as the National Federation of Workers in Hotels and Allied Establishments. Under the new legislation these workers have lost the right to organise and their leaders find themselves denied trade union protection, and the result has been that the employers have carried out a number of dismissals.

435. With regard to these specific allegations the Government confines itself to stating that the requirement of a minimum number of members meets the necessity of guaranteeing the existence of the trade unions, because it is customary in Peru to establish trade unions with large executive committees of ten to 15 members, and that, in the absence of the requirement of section 7, trade unions would consist only of their executive committees. Moreover, the Government goes on, this legal requirement does not prevent the representation of workers who are not affiliated to a trade union for the purposes of making claims and concluding collective agreements.

436. The complainants also say that section 9 of the decree infringes Article 3 of the Convention. Subsection (b) of section 9 stipulates that in order to be a member of a workers' trade union a person shall belong to the undertaking or activity uniting them. The Government makes no observations on this point in its reply.

437. The Committee considers that, before expressing an opinion on this aspect of the case, it must have certain additional information from the Government. It therefore recommends the Governing Body to request the Government to state whether workers in work centres with fewer than 20 members can unite with those of other work centres to form a trade union and, if so, subject to what conditions.

438. The Committee also considers it necessary in connection with these allegations to examine section 11 of the decree, amended by Presidential Decree No. 021 of 21 December 1962, which is referred to by the Government in its report on the application of Convention No. 87.[1] Section 11 as amended requires that a trade union shall consist of more than 50 per cent. of the wage earners if it is a wage earners' union, more than 50 per cent. of the salaried employees if it is a salaried employees' union, and more than 50 per cent. of the wage earners and of the salaried employees if it is a mixed union.

439. The Committee recalls that the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations, when examining a similar provision in Burmese legislation [2], stated that such a provision was not in conformity with Article 2 of the Convention, which provides that workers shall have the right " to establish ... organisations of their own choosing without previous authorisation ". The Committee of Experts added that such a legal provision placed a major obstacle in the way of the establishment of trade unions capable of " furthering and defending the interests " of their members and moreover had the indirect result of prohibiting the establishment of a new trade union whenever a trade union already existed in the undertaking or establishment concerned.

[1] A summary of the report is given in Summary of Reports on Ratified Conventions (Articles 22 and 35 of the Constitution), Report III (Part I), International Labour Conference, 49th Session, Geneva, 1965 (Geneva, I.L.O., 1965), pp. 184-185.

440. In these circumstances the Committee recommends the Governing Body to draw the attention of the Government to the opinion expressed by the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations mentioned in the previous paragraph, to suggest to the Government the desirability of studying any reforms that may be necessary to bring Peruvian legislation in this connection into harmony with Convention No. 87, which has been ratified by Peru, and to express the hope that such reforms will be introduced as soon as possible, perhaps with the promulgation of the Labour Code whose drafting is announced by the Government.

(d) Allegation relating to the Personal Quality of Trade Union Office.

441. Section 10 of Presidential Decree No. 009 provides that membership or office in a trade union is strictly personal, and that it cannot be transferred or delegated for any reason. In their communication of 3 June 1963 the complainants state that this provision prohibits the granting of mandates. As an example of the difficulties with which this faces trade unionists they add that under the section referred to trade union leaders are compelled to travel themselves to Lima every time there is business to transact, with all the consequent expenses, unless they wish to see business protracted indefinitely.

442. The Committee observes that in its reply the Government makes no observation on this allegation.

443. The Committee therefore recommends the Governing Body to request the Government to state whether section 10 of Presidential Decree No. 009 must be interpreted or not as denying trade union officers the power of conferring a mandate on third parties to carry out business on behalf of the trade union.

(e) Allegations relating to the Compulsory Registration of Trade Unions.

444. According to the complainants the chapter of Presidential Decree No. 009 dealing with the registration of trade unions (sections 11 to 19) contains provisions impairing the guarantees of Convention No. 87 by making registration compulsory and so empowering the labour authorities (section 15) to refuse registration on the grounds of infringement of, or failure to comply with, the legal provisions. They add that the decree goes so far as to require the submission of documents attested by a notary or justice of the peace, or certified by the members of the executive committee on their own responsibility, and they consider that the requirement of registration as derived from the provisions of the decree has the character of original legislation and not that of regulations issued in accordance with Convention No. 87, whose principles have been incorporated in Peruvian legislation by virtue of ratification. In fact, a reading of section 11, as amended by Presidential Decree No. 021 of 21 December 1962 (see paragraph 438 above), shows that the law requires the submission of an application accompanied by the following documents: copy of the minutes of the founding meetings, stating the number of workers and proving that the trade union has been established with the required number of members; a full list of members; and a copy of the by-laws and of the minutes of the general assembly approving them. These documents are to be submitted in duplicate, attested by a notary or, in the absence of a notary, a justice of the peace, or certified by the members of the executive committee. Section 13, also as amended by Presidential Decree No. 021, lays down in detail the form in which the list of members is to be submitted. This is to be typed and to contain, in separate lists for wage earners and salaried employees, various personal details including nationality and the number of the military and electoral record books, each person having to sign or make his fingerprint.

445. With regard to these allegations the Government replies that the compulsory registration of trade unions fulfils the purpose of establishing their existence so that the authorities can give them fuller attention and attribute representative status. The Government adds that it is not a question of recognition, which has been abolished in Peru, but of " statistical registration ".

446. The Committee observes in this connection that section 2 of Presidential Decree No. 021 of 21 December 1962, amending Presidential Decree No. 009, provides that the compulsory registration of trade unions shall grant representative status with the employers and the labour authorities in labour claims. The Committee also observes that compulsory registration is indispensable if the trade unions are to be considered in the formation of national or international bodies or committees of a bipartite or tripartite nature.

447. In these circumstances the Committee considers it necessary to recall what was expressed by the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations in 1959. The Committee of Experts considered that, although the founders of an organisation were not freed from the duty of observing formalities as to publicity or other similar formalities which might be prescribed by certain legislation, these formalities must not be such as to be equivalent in practice to previous authorisation. The Committee of Experts, while it pointed out that in some countries the formalities prescribed by law (deposit of constitution and rules, registration or other measures of publicity) were compulsory and in other countries optional, expressed the opinion that the compulsory or optional nature of the formalities prescribed did not always provide a sufficient criterion for determining whether there was or was not a requirement of previous authorisation. In fact, in some cases, although registration was compulsory, the authority competent to effect the registration had no power to refuse it or, which amounted to the same thing in practice, could refuse registration only because of a formal defect which it was always possible to remedy. Nevertheless, the Committee of Experts concluded that when registration, even if it was optional, conferred on the registered organisation the basic rights that it needed in " furthering and defending the interests " of its members, possession by the authority responsible for registration of power to refuse it led to a situation that was not very different from that in cases in which previous authorisation was required.[1]

448. The Committee therefore recommends the Governing Body to draw the attention of the Government to the importance it attaches to the opinion of the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations referred to in paragraph 447 above, to suggest to it the desirability of studying any reforms that may be necessary to bring Peruvian legislation in this connection into harmony with Convention No. 87 and to express the hope that such reforms will be introduced as soon as possible, perhaps with the promulgation of the Labour Code whose drafting is announced by the Government.

(f) Allegations relating to the Right to Organise of State Employees.

449. According to the complaint of C.T.P. section 28 of the decree removes from the scope of Convention No. 87 workers in the service of the State and of semi-state bodies and so impairs the right to organise established under this Convention for workers without distinction whatsoever. This deprives the workers referred to of the opportunity of advancing their claims, and so many of them have to endure unfavourable working conditions and others have been the object of damaging measures. In this connection the complainants mention the fines imposed on the workers of the Tobacco Agency for having refused to carry out voluntary work, the " subhuman " conditions in which the workers of the Guano and Salt Company work, and other facts.

450. In its reply of 10 September 1965 the Government states that public servants have the opportunity of associating for cultural and sporting activities and for purposes of welfare and co-operation and are protected by a scheme covering stability of employment, holidays with pay, special leave, redundancy and retirement pensions, an assistance fund and other forms of social security. The Government adds that it is, moreover, bringing Peruvian legislation into harmony with the Convention and that the new Act No. 15215

[1] See Report of the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations (Articles 19, 22 and 35 of the Constitution), Report III (Part IV), International Labour Conference, 43rd Session, Geneva, 1959 (Geneva, I.L.O., 1959), paras. 26 and 27, p. 107.

(establishing a charter and register for the teaching profession in Peru) will provide for the right to organise in this sector of the public service.

451. Reference to section 28 of Presidential Decree No. 009 shows that the decree applies to employers, wage earners and salaried employees in the private sector and that employees subject to special statutes will be governed by their own regulations. It should not, therefore, be inferred that this provision in itself excludes employees of the State or of semi-state bodies from enjoying the rights and guarantees set forth in Convention No. 87. The Government in its reply seems to give implicit recognition to its obligation, arising from the ratification of Convention No. 87, to grant public employees the right to organise. Article 2 of Convention No. 87 provides that workers, " without distinction whatsoever, shall have the right to establish . . . organisations of their own choosing without previous authorisation ", and the only restriction envisaged in this Convention is that of Article 9, which allows the extent to which the guarantees provided for in the Convention shall apply to the armed forces and the police to be determined by national laws or regulations.

452. In these circumstances the Committee expressly emphasises, as it has done on other occasions [1], the importance of ensuring that persons employed in the service of the State should be guaranteed the right to establish trade unions and to register them with a view to their lawful operation, and recommends the Governing Body to bring this principle to the attention of the Government and to request the latter to keep it informed of any progress made towards giving full effect to the principle.

(g) Allegations relating to Requirements for the Formation of Federations and Confederations.

453. C.T.P. asserts that various provisions of the chapter in the Presidential Decree dealing with organisations of higher degree (sections 22 to 27) restrict the right held by workers' organisations under Article 5 of Convention No. 87 to establish federations and confederations with the guarantees provided for basic organisations under Articles 2 and 3 of the Convention. According to the complainants the requirement of five trade unions for the establishment of a federation and ten federations for the establishment of a confederation not only infringes the Convention but also disregards the real situation of the country, since in Peru there are what are known as trade union associations covering trade unions of a single political or geographic area and this does not exclude the uniting of the basic organisations within an industry to form the corresponding federation. Thus, with the agreement of the C.T.P. congresses, the trade union organisation of Peru embraces the provincial, departmental and regional associations, besides the Private Employees' Trade Union Federation and the industrial federations, the latter often consisting of the trade union committees of small establishments or craft centres. These industrial federations are in many cases true craft unions established by workers in the same trade working in various work centres.

454. In its reply of 10 September 1965 the Government states that section 23 of the decree, respecting the number of trade unions or federations required for the establishment of organisations of higher degree, meets the necessity of taking account of the average number of organisations existing in each branch of activity. The Government also asserts that, under the present régime of constitutional government, no measures have been adopted affecting the activities of the existing trade union associations, and it refers to what it has already stated in connection with the promulgation of Act No. 15060 of 19 June 1964 establishing the Committee for Drafting the Labour Code.

455. The Committee observes that section 23 of Presidential Decree No. 009 has also been amended by Presidential Decree No. 021 (see paragraph 438 above). Even in its amended form, section 23, which requires the combination of no fewer than five trade unions in the same type of activity for the formation of a federation and no fewer than ten federations for the formation of a confederation, conflicts with Articles 5 and 6 of the Convention, which lay down that " workers' and employers' organisations shall have the right to establish . . . federations and confederations " and that the guarantees provided for basic organisations by Article 2 of the Convention shall apply to the establishment of these organisations of higher degree. In the present case it should be pointed out in particular that section 23 of the presidential decree appears, as the complainants maintain, to prevent the establishment of organisations of higher degree combining trade unions or federations of different activities operating in the same locality or area.

456. The Committee therefore recommends the Governing Body to draw the attention of the Government to the importance that it attaches to the provisions of Articles 5 and 6 of Convention No. 87, which are infringed by section 23 of Presidential Decree No. 009, to suggest to the Government the desirability of studying any legislative reforms that may be necessary to eliminate the contradiction, and to express the hope that such reforms will be introduced as soon as possible, perhaps with the promulgation of the Labour Code whose drafting is announced by the Government.

(h) Allegations relating to the Dismissal of Trade Union Officers.

457. C.T.P. alleges that the officers of trade union organisations already existing but not meeting the requirements of Presidential Decree No. 009 have been deprived of trade union protection and are being dismissed.

458. The Government makes no specific reference to the alleged dismissals in its reply.

459. In these circumstances the Committee recommends the Governing Body to request the Government to send its observations as soon as possible on the alleged dismissals, which may be infringements of Article 1 of the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), which has been ratified by Peru.

* * *

460. With regard to the case as a whole, the Committee recommends the Governing Body—

(a) in respect of the allegations relating to a legislative draft to amend the Penal Code, to take note of the Government's statement to the effect that there is no longer any intention of promulgating this draft and to decide that there would be no object in examining this aspect of the case further;

(b) in respect of the allegation relating to the right not to join a trade union (section 4 of Presidential Decree No. 009), to decide, for the reasons given in paragraph 427 above, that there would be no object in examining this aspect of the case further;

(c) in respect of specific allegations relating to other provisions of Presidential Decree No. 009, to draw the attention of the Government—

(i) to the importance of ensuring that persons employed in the service of the State should be guaranteed the right to establish trade unions, a principle that derives from Convention No. 87, which has been ratified by Peru, and under Article 2 of which workers, without distinction whatsoever, shall have the right to establish organisations of their own choosing without previous authorisation;

(ii) to the importance it attaches to the principle that it is not appropriate to prohibit all political activities by occupational organisations in general terms, but that the judicial authorities should be entrusted with the task of pronouncing on abuses that might be committed by organisations that had lost sight of the fact that their fundamental objective, according to the resolution concerning the independence of the trade union movement adopted by the Conference in 1952, is " the economic and social advancement of the workers ";

(iii) to the importance it attaches to the opinion expressed by the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations that, although the founders of an organisation are not freed from the duty of observing formalities as to publicity or other similar formalities which may be prescribed by legislation, these formalities must not be such as to be equivalent in practice to previous authorisation, and that, when registration confers on the organisations the basic rights that they need in furthering and defending the interests of their members, the fact that registration can be refused at the discretion of the authorities leads to a situation that is not very different from that in cases in which previous authorisation is required;

(iv) to the importance that must be attached to the provisions of Articles 5 and 6 of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), provisions that are infringed by section 23 of Presidential Decree No. 009 as amended by Presidential Decree No. 021, which requires a minimum number of trade unions or federations for the establishment of organisations of higher degree and prevents the establishment of federations and confederations bringing together the trade unions or federations of different activities in a specific locality or area;

(v) to the importance that it attaches to the opinion expressed by the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations, when examining a provision similar to that of section 11 of Presidential Decree No. 009, which provides that a trade union can exist only if it organises more than 50 per cent. of the workers concerned, namely that such a provision is not in conformity with Article 2 of Convention No. 87, places a major obstacle in the way of the establishment of trade unions and has the indirect result of prohibiting the establishment of a new trade union whenever a trade union already exists in the undertaking or establishment concerned;

(vi) to the desirability of studying any reforms that may be necessary to bring Peruvian legislation, as soon as possible, into harmony with the principles and considerations set forth in clauses (i) to (v) above;

(d) in respect of the allegations relating to the minimum number of 20 members required for the establishment of a trade union, to request the Government to state whether workers in work centres with fewer than 20 members can unite with those of other work centres to form a trade union and, if so, subject to what conditions;

(e) in respect of the allegation of the complainants that under section 10 of Presidential Decree No. 009 trade union officers are denied by law the power of conferring a mandate on third parties to carry out business on behalf of the trade union, to request the Government to send its observations as soon as possible;

(f) in respect of the dismissals of trade union officers alleged by the complainants, which are mentioned in paragraph 457 above, to request the Government to send its observations as soon as possible;

(g) to take note of this interim report, on the understanding that the Committee will submit a further report when it has received from the Government the observations and information referred to in subparagraphs (d), (e) and (f) of this paragraph.

Case No. 365 :

Complaint Presented by the Union of Congolese Workers and the General Union of Trade Union Federations of Congolese Farmers and Workers against the Government of the Congo (Leopoldville)

461. This case was first examined by the Committee at its meeting in June 1964, when it submitted an interim report to the Governing Body in paragraphs 354 to 367 of its 76th Report, which was approved by the Governing Body at its 159th Session (June-July 1964).

462. It was alleged that on 15 October 1963, while on a tour of inspection of the local sections of the complaining organisation, its National President, Mr. Raymond Beya, was arbitrarily arrested and imprisoned. In its observations contained in communications dated 3 January and 12 February 1964 the Government stated that Mr. Beya had been sentenced in virtue of a judgment made in due form by the police court at Butembo on 17 October 1963. In the communication dated 3 January 1964 the Government declared that he was at liberty.

463. At its meeting in June 1964 the Committee, in paragraph 367 of its 76th Report, recommended the Governing Body to request the Government to be good enough to furnish the text of the judgment in question and of the reasons on which it was based. This request was transmitted to the Government by a letter dated 18 June 1964.

464. In a letter dated 10 October 1964 the Government stated that it had written to the Attorney-General asking for the information requested by the Committee, but that, " as the control of Northern Kivu by the rebels prevents any communication with the authorities of that region ", the Attorney-General had not been able to furnish the information.

465. At its meeting in November 1964 the Committee took note of this communication and decided to request the Government to furnish the information in question as soon as possible. The Government was informed of this decision by a letter dated 17 November 1964.

466. On 19 January 1965 the Government stated in reply that it still did not have in its possession the judgment relating to the case of Mr. Beya " because of the confused situation still subsisting in the north-eastern part of the country as a result of the rebellion ".

467. This reply was noted by the Committee at its meeting in February 1965, when the Committee decided again to request the Government to furnish the text of the judgment as soon as possible.

468. On 17 July 1965 the General Union of Trade Union Federations of Congolese Farmers and Workers (U.G.C.S.P.T.C.) addressed a complaint to the I.L.O. in which it is alleged that on 29 June 1965 Mr. Beya was in the vicinity of Goma, in Northern Kivu, where he had gone to give a course within the framework of a workers' education programme and to organise a works council in a nearby undertaking, when he was suddenly arrested by armed police, on the orders of the Provincial Labour Inspector, Mr. Sivanzire Bonaventure. The complainants state that on 17 July 1965 he was still being held in prison without trial and that this had caused the suspension of the activities of his organisation.

469. On 8 August 1965 the North Kivu Provincial Committee of U.G.C.S.P.T.C. addressed a complaint to the I.L.O. It is alleged that Mr. Sylvestre Kalunga, the secretary of the organisation for the Walitale territory, was murdered by the District Officer of that territory. As regards Mr. Raymond Beya, this complainant states that, having already been arrested in 1963 and imprisoned without trial, he was arrested, ill-treated and arbitrarily imprisoned on 4 August 1964 and held without trial until November 1964, when he was released. On 29 September 1964, it is alleged, Mr. Oscar Nkole, Provincial Inspector of the Union, was also arrested and ill-treated in Ruthurn territory and imprisoned as a thief in order to prevent the unions from operating in Ruthurn. He was never brought to trial and was released in November 1964.

470. The complaint of U.G.C.S.P.T.C. dated 8 August 1965 was transmitted to the Government, for its observations, by a letter dated 27 August 1965. No observations on this complaint have been received.

471. On 11 August 1965 the Government furnished its observations on the complaint of U.G.C.S.P.T.C. dated 17 July 1965. The Government states that the allegations against Labour Inspector Sivanzire Bonaventure (see paragraph 468 above) are without foundation. The Government forwarded a statement by this inspector in which he declares that in February-March 1964 he was sent to make inquiries in Northern Kivu into the activities of Mr. Beya and Mr. Nkole (who is referred to in the complaint dated 8 August 1965). Mr. Bonaventure states that these "self-styled trade unionists" first used as a front for their activities the Union of Congolese Workers and then changed to another union,

P.A.N.A.T.R.A., finally joining another union, U.G.C.S.P.T.C. On 9 June 1965, he declares, Messrs. Beya and Nkole went to C.E.C. (the meaning of these initials is not explained) in Goma and withdrew 50,000 francs as an advance from the accountant, in the absence of himself and the labour officer. This money had been intended to be used to pay five clerks who had been dismissed from C.E.C. The two trade unionists, says Mr. Bonaventure, paid two of the clerks but retained the remaining 30,000 francs. As they refused to attend to give an explanation he took action against them as embezzlers of public funds.

472. In many cases in the past where trade unionists have been arrested for political offences or for offences under ordinary law the Committee has emphasised the importance it attaches to ensuring that such persons should be tried within the shortest possible period by an impartial and independent judicial authority.[1]

473. In these circumstances the Committee recommends the Governing Body—

(a) to draw the attention of the Government to the importance which the Governing Body has always attached to ensuring that trade unionists arrested for political offences or for offences under ordinary law should be tried within the shortest possible period by an impartial and independent judicial authority;

(b) to request the Government to inform the Governing Body as a matter of urgency, having regard to the principle enunciated above, as to the present situation with regard to Mr. Beya and Mr. Nkole;

(c) to request the Government once again to furnish the text of the judgment by virtue of which Mr. Beya was sentenced at Butembo on 17 October 1963;

(d) to request the Government to furnish its observations on the complaint presented on 8 August 1965 by the General Union of Trade Union Federations of Congolese Farmers and Workers.

Case No. 385:

Complaints Presented by the World Federation of Trade Unions, the Latin American Confederation of Christian Trade Unionists and the International Federation of Christian Trade Unions against the Government of Brazil

474. This case was first examined by the Committee at its 39th Session in February 1965, when it submitted an interim report to the Governing Body in paragraphs 133 to 152 of its 81st Report. The Committee considered the matter again at its 40th Session, in May 1965, when it submitted a further interim report in paragraphs 271 to 277 of its 83rd Report. The 81st and 83rd Reports of the Committee were approved by the Governing Body at its 161st (March 1965) and 162nd (May-June 1965) Sessions respectively.

475. The case raised two series of allegations: one relating to the placing of trade union organisations under control, and the other to measures taken against trade union leaders.

Allegations relating to the Placing of Trade Union Organisations under Control

476. With regard to the first series of allegations the Committee, at its meeting in May 1965, took note of statements by the Government that the placing of trade union organisations under control had affected only 10 per cent. of such organisations and had been dictated solely by imperative reasons of public order, that this control had been raised in the case of 398 organisations and that, by June 1965, it would also have been raised in the case of the remaining organisations, numbering less than 100. The Committee therefore recommended the Governing Body to request the Government to be good enough to keep it informed as to developments in this connection.

477. In this connection the Government furnished the following information in two communications dated respectively 4 August and 5 November 1965. The control under which 600 of the 4,000 Brazilian trade union organisations had been placed was terminated entirely on 25 June 1965; the organisations concerned were given 90 days within which to hold elections; in the case of 50 per cent. of them this procedure has been concluded; in the case of the others it is in progress and all measures have been taken, declares the Government, to expedite the conclusion. Finally, the Government indicates that, of the seven national confederations of workers, only that of the seafarers has still not held elections, but that the preparations are being made and they will be held shortly.

478. In these circumstances the Committee recommends the Governing Body, while emphasising once again the importance which it attaches to the fact that the placing of trade union organisations under control may entail a serious danger of restricting the right of workers' organisations to elect their representatives in full freedom and to organise their administration and activities, to note the Government's statement that the control of trade union organisations in Brazil has terminated and that elections are now taking place, and to request the Government to be good enough to continue to keep the Governing Body informed of further developments with regard to this matter.

Allegations relating to Measures Taken against Trade Union Leaders

479. With regard to the allegations relating to measures taken against trade union leaders the Committee, at its meeting in May 1965, recommended the Governing Body, as it had already done at its meeting in February, to request the Government to be good enough to furnish information concerning the proceedings taken in the case of the detained trade union leaders and to furnish the texts of the judgments, when they had been handed down, together with the reasons adduced therein.

480. With regard to the particular case of Mr. Clodsmith Riani, the Government, in a communication dated 27 May 1965, states: " The prosecutions brought against Mr. Riani in the military courts and in the ordinary courts are proceeding normally. However, the absence of a judgment is due to the many motions filed by counsel for the accused, and which relate to the discovery of evidence and to the summoning of further witnesses."

481. In a communication dated 6 November 1965 the Government stated that Mr. Riani was liberated on 29 September 1965, following habeas corpus proceedings. The Government stated further that the person concerned had again been detained since then " on another charge ". In conclusion, the Government declared that further habeas corpus proceedings had been instituted before the higher military court, which was to deal with the matter on 10 November 1965.

482. In a communication dated 11 November 1965 the Government now states that the higher military court, on 10 November 1965, denied the application for habeas corpus made to it on behalf of Mr. Riani; the Government further states that a third application for habeas corpus has been made on behalf of Mr. Riani and that it will keep the Governing Body informed as to the outcome of the further proceedings which are pending.

483. The Committee notes that the higher military court, as reconstituted by Institutional Act No. 2 of 27 October 1965, shall consist of 15 judges appointed for life by the President of the Republic, with the title of minister, four being selected from among serving general officers of the Army, three from among serving general officers of the Navy, three from among serving general officers of the Air Force, and five being civilians.

484. While noting that a third application for habeas corpus has been instituted, the Committee considers it necessary to draw the very special attention of the Governing Body to the exceptionally serious nature of the circumstances of this case. Mr. Riani, who at the moment of his original arrest was President of the National Confederation of Industrial Workers of Brazil, was also, and still is, a deputy member of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office. He was imprisoned for the first time on 6 April 1964. Having been freed following habeas corpus proceedings on 29 September 1965, he was again detained on another charge. A second application for habeas corpus was denied and a third application is pending. Without expressing any opinion on the substance of the charges brought against Mr. Riani, the Committee must draw attention to its established jurisprudence [1] in accordance with which it has always emphasised that, where trade unionists are arrested for political offences or common law crimes, the persons concerned should receive a fair trial at the earliest possible moment by an impartial and independent judicial authority. This principle represents the application to the questions submitted to the Committee of the provisions of articles 9, 10 and 11 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, adopted by the General Assembly of the United Nations as a common standard of achievement for all peoples and all nations, which are in the following terms:

Article 9. No one shall be subjected to arbitrary arrest, detention or exile.

Article 10. Everyone is entitled in full equality to a fair and public hearing by an independent and impartial tribunal, in the determination of his rights and obligations and of any criminal charge against him.

Article 11. (1) Everyone charged with a penal offence has the right to be presumed innocent until proved guilty according to law in a public trial at which he has had all the guarantees necessary for his defence.

(2) No one shall be held guilty of any penal offence on account of any act or omission which did not constitute a penal offence, under national or international law, at the time when it was committed. Nor shall a heavier penalty be imposed than the one that was applicable at the time the penal offence was committed.

This principle, which the Committee has applied to all the complaints of this nature which have been submitted to it in accordance with the procedure established by mutual agreement between the United Nations and the International Labour Organisation, assumes a quite special importance when the person concerned is a member or deputy member of the Governing Body of the I.L.O. Article 40 of the Constitution of the I.L.O. provides that members of the Governing Body shall enjoy " such privileges and immunities are as necessary for the independent exercise of their functions in connection with the Organisation ". The Governing Body must necessarily regard with grave concern a case in which a person to whom these provisions apply remains in detention, without having been tried by an impartial and independent judicial authority, for a period of 19 months, and above all after having been freed under habeas corpus procedure.

485. In these circumstances the Committee recommends the Governing Body—

(a) to draw the attention of the Government of Brazil to the importance of the considerations set forth in paragraph 484 above;

(b) to request the Government of Brazil to take the necessary measures to ensure that the case is dealt with on its merits within a very short period;

(c) to request the Government to forward to the Governing Body the texts of the habeas corpus judgments already given or to be given and of the judgments to be given on the merits of the case;

(d) to request the Government to forward to the Governing Body, not later than 1 February 1966, information as to the position reached in the proceedings and as to the situation of Mr. Riani at that time.

486. With regard to the cases of the trade union leaders other than Mr. Riani the Government, in a communication dated 22 June 1965, gives the following information concerning 42 of the 47 trade union leaders referred to by W.F.T.U.: 11 are at liberty with no charges pending against them, 15 are at liberty while their cases are being investigated, nine are abroad, four have fled, and three are detained pending trial.

487. The Committee recommends the Governing Body to take note of the information furnished by the Government and to request the Government to be good enough to keep it informed of further developments regarding the persons concerned.

488. In a communication dated 4 October 1965 the Latin American Confederation of Christian Trade Unionists alleges that the military court of Belo Horizonte recently pronounced the following sentences: Mr. Antonio Faria Lopez, former President of the Belo Horizonte Bank Employees' Union, 18 years' imprisonment; Mr. Fausto Drumond, former President of the I.A.P.B. of Minas Gerais, 15 years' imprisonment; Mr. José Boggione, former Secretary of the Belo Horizonte Bank Employees' Union, 15 years' imprisonment; Mr. Alberto José dos Santos, former Secretary of the same organisation, ten years' imprisonment. According to the complainants the persons concerned, sentenced on the ground of subversion, were in reality sentenced because of their trade union activities. The complainants allege further that under Decree No. 40 the Government requires candidates in trade union elections to submit an ideology certificate, a good conduct certificate and another certificate proving that they enjoy their political rights.

489. The text of this communication was transmitted to the Government for its observations by a letter dated 21 October 1965, to which no reply has so far been received.

490. In these circumstances the Committee recommends the Governing Body to request the Government to be good enough to furnish its observations on the communication dated 4 October 1965 from the Latin American Confederation of Christian Trade Unionists.

491. With regard to the case as a whole the Committee recommends the Governing Body—

(a) to note the Government's statement that the control of trade union organisations in Brazil has terminated and that elections are now taking place, and to request the Government to be good enough to continue to keep the Governing Body informed of further developments with regard to this matter;

(b) with regard to the particular case of Mr. Riani—

(i) to draw the attention of the Government of Brazil to the importance of the considerations set forth in paragraph 484 above;

(ii) to request the Government of Brazil to take the necessary measures to ensure that the case is dealt with on its merits within a very short period;

(iii) to request the Government to forward to the Governing Body the texts of the habeas corpus judgments already given or to be given and of the judgments to be given on the merits of the case;

(iv) to request the Government to forward to the Governing Body, not later than 1 February 1966, information as to the position reached in the proceedings and as to the situation of Mr. Riani at that time;

(c) to request the Government to be good enough to keep it informed as to further developments in the situation with regard to the measures taken against trade union leaders other than Mr. Riani, and to furnish the texts of any judgments handed down and of the reasons adduced therein;

(d) to request the Government to be good enough to furnish its observations on the allegations made by the Latin American Confederation of Christian Trade Unionists in its communication dated 4 October 1965;

(e) to take note of the present interim report, it being understood that the Committee will submit a further report to the Governing Body when it has received the information and observations referred to in subparagraphs (a), (b), (c) and (d) above.

Case No. 399 :

Complaints Presented by the General Confederation of Labour of Argentina against the Government of Argentina

492. This case was examined previously by the Committee at its 40th Session (May 1965), when it submitted an interim report, which appears in paragraphs 278 to 304 of its 83rd Report, approved by the Governing Body at its 162nd Session.

493. In paragraph 304 of this report the Committee, having examined the allegations of the complainants and the reply of the Government, set forth certain recommendations and a request for information in the following terms:

With regard to the case as a whole the Committee recommends the Governing Body—

(a) as regards the allegations relating to non-attendance by the Argentine Workers' delegation at the 48th Session of the International Labour Conference, to decide that there would be no object in continuing to examine this aspect of the case;

(b) as regards the allegations relating to interference by public authorities in the finances of trade unions, to take note of Argentine legislation on the supervision of administration of trade union property and funds, to call the Government's attention to the considerations set out in paragraphs 285 to 288 above, and to invite it to re-examine the said legislation in the light thereof, particularly as regards the reference of the results of administrative audits to a law court so as to ensure due process of law and, if appropriate, application of sanctions by the court;

(c) to take note of the present interim report, on the understanding that the Committee will report further to the Governing Body when it has received the information from the Government referred to in paragraph 298 above.

494. The Government sent additional information in a communication dated 27 August 1965.

495. Argentina has ratified the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), and the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98).

Allegations relating to Government Interference in the Finances of Trade Unions

496. In its communication of 27 August 1965 the Government gives certain information relating to the allegations concerning interference by the public authorities in trade union finances, which were discussed by the Committee in paragraphs 280 to 289 of its 83rd Report and on which it gave its final conclusions in paragraph 304 (b) of that report; these conclusions are reproduced in paragraph 493 of the present report.

497. The Government indicates in this connection the purpose of the activities of the Audit Department, which comes under the Directorate General of Occupational Associations of the Ministry of Labour, as well as the procedure to be followed. The Government adds that the fact that the activities carried on are confidential to the parties concerned meets the reservation expressed on the possibility that any organisation being investigated may be made an object of publicity.

498. The Committee notes with interest that the information supplied by the Government throws some light on the practical application of the relevant legislation, but considers that it contains no element that might alter the conclusions that it has reached on these allegations and which are reproduced in paragraph 493 of the present report.

Allegations relating to Proceedings against Trade Union Officers

499. When the Committee examined these allegations for the first time at its 40th Session, observing that officers of more than 300 organisations were facing proceedings for reasons of state security and that the various cases were before the courts, it asked the Government to send it information on the exact nature of the offences with which these trade union officers were charged and to keep it informed of any development that might arise.

500. In its communication of 27 August 1965 the Government confines itself to stating that it has asked the judicial authorities for the relevant information, which will be sent to the Committee as soon as it is received.

501. The Committee observes that the statement of the Government contains no information enabling it to go further in the study of these allegations at the present stage.

502. In these circumstances the Committee is compelled once more to request the Government to send concrete information as soon as possible on the exact nature of the offences with which officers of more than 300 trade union organisations are charged.

503. In view of the foregoing the Committee recommends the Governing Body to take note of this interim report, on the understanding that the Committee will submit a further report when it has received the information it has decided to request from the Government, as indicated in paragraph 502 above.

Case No. 419 :

Complaints Presented by the National Union of C.A.T.C. Unions of the Republic of the Congo, the International Federation of Christian Trade Unions, the African Trade Union Confederation and the International Federation of Commercial, Clerical and Technical Employees against the Government of the Congo (Brazzaville)

504. This case has already come before the Committee at its 39th and 40th Sessions, held respectively in February and in May 1965. On both occasions the Committee submitted interim reports to the Governing Body, which adopted them at its 161st Session (March 1965) and at its 162nd Session (May 1965). The first of these reports is to be found in paragraphs 176 to 193 of the Committee's 81st Report, and the second in paragraphs 360 to 374 of its 83rd Report.

505. The case originally involved two sets of allegations, one concerned with action taken against the National Union of C.A.T.C. Unions and its leaders, and the other relating to the arrest and ill-treatment of two trade unionists from Malawi.

506. As regards the second set of allegations, the Committee has submitted its final conclusions to the Governing Body, which has approved them.[1] No reference will therefore be made to them in the paragraphs which follow, which will deal exclusively with the set of allegations which remains outstanding.

507. This aspect of the case, the detailed background to and analysis of which may be found in the Committee's 81st Report [2], is essentially concerned with discriminatory action taken against the National Union of C.A.T.C. Unions, the ransacking of its premises and the arrest of its leaders, including its President, Mr. Fulgence Biyaoula, who is alleged to have been tortured as well.

[1] See 83rd Report, paras. 362-367.

[2] See paras. 176-181, 183-188, and 190-192.

508. At its 39th Session in February 1965 the Committee began by noting the assurances given in Addis Ababa to the Director-General by the Minister of Labour of the Congo (Brazzaville) to the effect that Mr. Biyaoula was not being subjected to torture, that his life was not in danger at all and that he would enjoy the guarantees of normal judicial procedure when he appeared in the near future before the courts. The Committee noted also that in its reply to the allegations in question the Government confined itself to declaring that "the Committee on Freedom of Association might designate one or more of its members to visit the Congo (Brazzaville) at the I.L.O.'s expense to inquire on the spot into the allegations made by the critics of [this] country's Government", and took the view that at that stage it should once more urge the Government to be good enough to furnish detailed observations on each of the specific allegations made by the various complaining organisations. In these circumstances it recommended the Governing Body in paragraph 193 of its 81st Report—

. . . . . .

(a) to reaffirm strongly the importance it attaches to the principles—

(i) that workers should have the right to establish and join organisations of their own choosing;

(ii) that workers' organisations should have the right to elect their representatives in full freedom, and that such representatives should be protected against any action being taken against them by reason of their trade union activities;

(iii) that trade unions should not be liable to be dissolved by administrative authority;

(b) to emphasise that measures of detention of trade unionists may involve a serious interference with the exercise of trade union rights if they are not accompanied by adequate judicial safeguards and to stress that it should be the policy of every government to take care to ensure the observance of human rights and especially of the right of all detained persons to receive a fair trial at the earliest possible moment by an impartial and independent judicial authority;

(c) to request the Government to be good enough to furnish detailed observations on the allegations referred to in paragraphs 187 and 188 of this report and information as to whether the assurances given to the Director-General by the Minister of Labour in the course of their interviews in Addis Ababa, referred to in paragraph 180 of this report, have been respected and, in particular, as to whether Mr. Biyaoula has received a fair trial attended by all the guarantees of normal judicial procedure and, if so, to be good enough to furnish a copy of the judgment and of the reasons adduced therein.

509. The foregoing conclusions were conveyed to the Government by letter dated 10 March 1965, followed by a reminder letter dated 5 April 1965. The Government replied in a communication dated 29 April 1965, which was brought to the notice of the Committee at its 40th Session in May 1965.

510. On that occasion the Committee observed that in the communication in question the Government failed to answer the specific questions asked in subparagraph (c) of paragraph 193 of the Committee's 81st Report, quoted above, but confined itself to renewing the invitation to the Committee to visit the Congo to which reference is made in paragraph 508 above.

511. In these circumstances the Committee felt that it must reaffirm the conclusions set forth in subparagraphs (a) and (b) of paragraph 193 of its 81st Report, and recommend the Governing Body to urge the Government strongly to be good enough to furnish the observations requested of it in subparagraph (c) of the same paragraph as soon as possible. This recommendation was approved by the Governing Body.

512. Furthermore, the Committee, and subsequently the Governing Body, drew the Government's attention to the resolution concerning freedom of association and protection of the right to organise adopted by the First African Regional Conference of the International Labour Organisation (Lagos, December 1960), which, in paragraph 7, "Requests the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to invite governments in respect of whose countries complaints may be made to the Governing Body Committee on Freedom of Association to give their wholehearted co-operation to that Committee, in particular by replying to requests for observations made to them and by taking the fullest possible account of any recommendations which may be made to them by the Governing Body following examination of such complaints", and, in paragraph 8, "Requests the Governing Body to accelerate as far a possible the procedure of its Committee on Freedom of Association and to give greater publicity to the conclusions of that Committee, particularly when certain governments refuse to co-operate loyally in the consideration of complaints submitted against them".

513. The conclusions referred to in the two preceding paragraphs were brought to the notice of the Government by letter dated 8 June 1965, to which no reply has been received to date, despite a reminder letter sent on 17 September 1965.

514. Furthermore, on 6 July 1965 the Director-General received a telegraphic communication signed by the President and the General Secretary of the International Federation of Christian Trade Unions informing him that the trade unionists imprisoned in Brazzaville were due at any moment to be arraigned before a people's court, and begging his " energetic and urgent " intervention. Following the receipt of this communication the Director-General, on 8 July 1965, cabled its contents to the Minister of Foreign Affairs of the Congo (Brazzaville), urging that the matter be given special attention and that the Director-General be kept informed of developments. This communication from the Director-General has likewise remained unanswered.

515. In the circumstances the Committee recommends the Governing Body—

(a) to draw the attention of the Government once again to the request made by the First African Regional Conference of the International Labour Organisation (Lagos, December 1960) that governments in respect of whose countries complaints may be made should be invited to give their wholehearted co-operation to the Committee, in particular by replying to requests for observations made to them and by taking the fullest possible account of any recommendations which may be made to them by the Governing Body following examination of such complaints;

(b) to draw the attention of the Government of the Congo (Brazzaville) to the importance which the Governing Body has always attached to the right of all detained persons to receive a fair trial at the earliest possible moment;

(c) to express its grave concern at the failure of the Government of the Congo (Brazzaville) to reply to the communication of the Director-General dated 8 July 1965 relating to trade unionists imprisoned in Brazzaville who were alleged to be due to be arraigned at any moment before a people's court;

(d) to request the Government to state whether Mr. Biyaoula, President of the National Union of C.A.T.C. Unions, has received a fair trial attended by all the guarantees of normal judicial procedure and, if so, to furnish a copy of the judgment and of the reasons adduced therein;

(e) to confirm the conclusions which it reached when the case was first examined and which are contained in subparagraphs (a) and (b) of paragraph 193 of the 81st Report of the Committee cited in paragraph 508 above;

(f) to request the Government once again to furnish detailed observations on the allegations relating to measures taken against the National Union of C.A.T.C. Unions referred to in paragraphs 187 and 188 of the 81st Report of the Committee.

Case No. 421 :

Complaint Presented by the Arab Federation of Petroleum Workers (Cairo) against the Government of the United Kingdom in respect of Aden

516. The complaint of the Arab Federation of Petroleum Workers (Cairo), dated 23 November 1964, and the observations thereon furnished by the Government, on 25 January 1965, were considered by the Committee at its meeting in February 1965, when the Committee submitted to the Governing Body the interim report contained in paragraphs 194 to 203 of its 81st Report.

517. The United Kingdom has ratified the Right of Association (Non-Metropolitan Territories) Convention, 1947 (No. 84), the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), and the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), and has declared them to be applicable without modification to Aden.

518. The complainants alleged that the following executive members of the Aden Petroleum Trade Union had been arrested by the authorities in Aden without valid reason: Messrs. Farouk Mekkawi, Ahmed Ali Hiethem and Mohamed El Aboudi, arrested on 27 August 1964; Messrs. Ahmed Abdel Malek, Taha Ali Mohamed Saad, Naser Omar, Ali Ahmed Hammami and Ahmed Hiedra, arrested on 14 October 1964; Mr. Taha Ghanem, arrested on 15 October 1964.

519. It appeared from the Government's reply dated 25 January 1965, analysed more fully in paragraphs 197 to 201 of the Committee's 81st Report, that of the nine persons named Messrs. Mohamed El Aboudi and Taha Ali Mohamed Saad had been released, while the Government had no record of any person named Ahmed Abdel Malek having been arrested on 14 October 1964.

520. The Committee observed, in paragraph 202 of its 81st Report, that in numerous cases in the past [1] in which trade union officers or members were preventively detained it has pointed out that in all such cases such measures may involve a grave interference with the exercise of trade union rights which it would seem necessary to justify by the existence of a serious emergency and which would be open to criticism unless accompanied by adequate judicial safeguards applied within a reasonable period, and that it should be the policy of every government to take care to ensure the observance of human rights and especially of the right of all detained persons to receive a fair trial at the earliest possible moment.

521. The Committee submitted to the Governing Body the recommendations contained in paragraph 203 of its 81st Report, which reads as follows:

In these circumstances the Committee, while appreciating the troubled nature of the situation in Aden in recent years, recommends the Governing Body—

(a) to draw the attention of the Government to the importance which it attaches to the observance of the right of all detained persons to receive a fair trial at the earliest possible moment;

(b) to request the Government to be good enough to indicate whether any of the persons indicated are still in detention and, if so, whether legal proceedings have been brought against them or when it is anticipated that such proceedings will be instituted;

(c) to take note of the present interim report. . . .

522. In a communication dated 26 May 1965 the Government states that no trade union officials or members are in detention because of trade union activities, that detentions are kept under review and that detainees are released to the extent that this is possible without impairing the capacity of the security authorities to conduct their operations against the terrorist acts that still persist.

523. In a communication dated 13 August 1965 the Government states that of the nine persons listed by the complainant, five have so far been released, including a Mr. Abdel Malik Israel Mohamed (if this is the person referred to by the complainants as Mr. Ahmed Abdel Malek). The four persons still in detention are Messrs. Faruq Mohamed Abdul Rahiman Makkawi (referred to by the complainants as Farouk Mekkawi), Ali Ahman Ali Hamami (named by the complainants as Ali Ahmed Hammami), Ahmed Haidra (named by the complainants as Ahmed Hiedra) and Taha Ahmad Ghanim (named by the complainants as Taha Ghanem). The authorities state that these four persons cannot at present be brought to trial, that they are detained under Emergency Regulations and that their release date cannot be anticipated, as their presence at large at this time would be prejudicial to the maintenance of public order and security. The Government affirms again that the detention of the persons in question arises solely from the need to combat subversion and terrorism and is no way connected with trade union activities.

524. In these circumstances the Committee recommends the Governing Body—

(a) to draw the attention of the Government once again to the importance which it attaches to the observance of the right of all detained persons to receive a fair trial at the earliest possible moment;

(b) to draw attention to the fact that the four trade unionists still in detention have now been held for over 12 months without trial;

(c) to express the hope that, in accordance with the principle enunciated in subparagraph (a) above, these persons will either be released or brought to trial at the earliest possible moment;

(d) to request the Government to inform the Governing Body as a matter of urgency as to what steps it is intended to take in this connection;

(e) to take note of the present interim report, it being understood that the Committee will report further on the matter to the Governing Body when the information referred to in subparagraph (d) above has been received.

Case No. 422 :

Complaints Presented by the Latin American Confederation of Christian Trade Unionists against the Government of Ecuador

525. This case was examined by the Committee at its sessions in February and May 1965 when it made interim reports.[1] In the 83rd Report, approved by the Governing Body at its 162nd Session (May 1965), the Committee made definitive recommendations on allegations relating to the intervention of the authorities in a conflict which had arisen on the Huayllamba estate. In the present report the Committee examines the remaining allegations, which relate to the detention of a number of trade union officers and to the infringement of trade union rights by the authorities in the province of Chimborazo.

526. The original complaint was submitted by the Latin American Confederation of Christian Trade Unionists (C.L.A.S.C.) on 24 November 1964. It was then forwarded to the Government, which sent in its observations on 5 January 1965. The complainants submitted another complaint in a letter dated 23 December 1964, which was also forwarded to the Government.

527. Ecuador has not ratified the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), but has ratified the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98).

Allegations regarding Detention of Trade Union Officers

528. In its communication dated 24 November 1964 C.L.A.S.C. declared, inter alia, that the Ecuadorian Federation of Catholic Workers (C.E.D.O.C.) was being systematically subjected to discrimination and prosecution which constituted an infringement of freedom of association. In September 1964 trade union leaders Francisco Checa and Carlos Aroca were incarcerated at Machachi on being apprehended attending a meeting of peasants convened to found a peasants' league for that locality. At approximately the same time, at Naranjito, trade unionists Pedro Moreno Rocha, Carlos Idovro Vergara and Mesías Zamora Pérez were imprisoned for distributing leaflets to peasants with the aim of convening a meeting to found another peasants' league.

529. In its reply dated 5 January 1965 the Government declared that C.E.D.O.C. had never been subjected to any discrimination, nor had its leaders been persecuted. The organisation concerned enjoyed the same safeguards for pursuing its trade union activity as other workers' associations formed in compliance with the law and recognised by the Government.

530. When examining the case at its 39th Session in February 1965 the Committee observed that the Government had referred neither to the specific allegations contained in the original complaint regarding the imprisonment of Francisco Checa, Carlos Aroca, Pedro Moreno Rocha, Carlos Idovro Vergara and Mesías Zamora Pérez, nor to the allegations contained in the complainants' letter of 23 December 1964, according to which Hugo Espinosa, a C.E.D.O.C. leader, had been arrested and was being kept incommunicado and other leaders, Luis Cajas and Teodoro Reinoso, had also been arrested, although they were subsequently released. The Committee considered that the elements submitted by the Government in its reply were not sufficient to enable the situation to be evaluated in the light of the allegations presented by the complainants; consequently it recommended the Governing Body [1] to request the Government to furnish its detailed observations on the various events mentioned in the original complaint and in the complainants' letter of 23 December 1964.

531. The Government sent two further communications relating to this case on 6 and 8 April 1965. However, since neither of these contained observations on the arrest of the trade union officers whose names had been cited, the Committee, having examined the case further at its 40th Session in May 1965, recommended the Governing Body to ask the Government once more to send its observations thereon. The relevant passage of paragraph 386 of the 83rd Report reads as follows:

> In all the circumstances the Committee recommends the Governing Body—
>
> . . . . . .
> (b) with respect to the allegations relating to the arrest of union leaders Francisco Checa, Carlos Aroca, Pedro Moreno Rocha, Carlos Idovro Vergara, Mesías Zamora Pérez, Hugo Espinosa, Luis Cajas and Teodoro Reinoso ... to request the Government once more to furnish its observations at the earliest possible date.

532. By letter dated 27 August 1965 the Government replied to the above reiterated request with the statement that the arrests in question had not been made on the ground of trade union activities, since such activities were fully guaranteed, but on the ground of penal offences such as were sanctioned in all legal systems.

533. The Committee observes that in its brief communication the Government does not deny that all the persons named by the complainants were indeed arrested, but rather appears to confirm this. However, the Government does not agree with the complainants when it states that the arrests were due to penal offences, whereas they claim that the object was to victimise the arrested persons for their trade union activities. Nor does the Government explain the specific character of the offences or other acts ascribed to the arrested persons, or whether judicial proceedings have been taken against them, or, if so, what was the result in each case.

534. On many occasions [2] when allegations that trade union leaders or workers had been arrested or detained on account of trade union activities have been met by governments

[1] See 81st Report, para. 209.

[2] See Sixth Report, Case No. 18 (Greece), paras. 323-326, Case No. 44 (Colombia), paras. 593-595, and Case No. 49 (Pakistan), paras. 807-811; 11th Report, Case No. 72 (Venezuela), para. 6 (c); 12th Report, Case No. 65 (Cuba), paras. 102-105, Case No. 66 (Greece), paras. 140-146, Case No. 68 (Colombia), with statements that the arrests or detentions were made for subversive activities, for reasons of internal security or for common law crimes, the Committee has followed the rule that the governments concerned should be requested to submit further and as precise information as possible concerning the arrests or detentions and the exact reasons therefor. If in certain cases the Committee has concluded that allegations relating to the arrests or detentions of trade union militants did not call for further examination, this has been after it has received information from the governments showing sufficiently precisely and with sufficient detail that the arrests or detentions were in no way occasioned by trade union activities but solely by activities outside the trade union sphere which were either prejudicial to public order or of a political character.[1] In cases where trade unionists have been sentenced, the Committee has also followed the practice of asking governments to communicate the texts of the judgments, with their grounds.[2]

535. Moreover, the Committee has also observed on previous occasions that where persons had been sentenced on grounds having no relation to trade union rights the matter would fall outside its competence [3], but has emphasised that the question as to whether such a matter is one relating to a criminal offence or to the exercise of trade union rights cannot be determined unilaterally by the government concerned.[4]

536. Accordingly, the Committee recommends the Governing Body to take note of the statements made by the Government in its letter of 27 August 1965 and, having regard to the contents of paragraphs 534 and 535 above, to ask the Government to send as soon as possible more complete information on this aspect of the case, including an account of the offences with which each of the trade unionists whose names are cited has been charged, the result of the proceedings and the text of any judgments given with their grounds.

Allegations respecting Infringement of Trade Union Rights in the Province of Chimborazo

537. The complainants' letter of 23 December 1964 referred also to problems which had arisen regarding the peasants in the province of Chimborazo, where the attitude taken by the civil and military chief of the province had prevented the workers from organising and proclaiming their rights, including payment of over four years' arrears of wages. At its 39th and 40th Sessions the Committee deferred examination of this aspect of the case because it had not received the Government's observations. The relevant parts of paragraph 386 of the 83rd Report read as follows:

In all the circumstances the Committee recommends the Governing Body—

. . . . . .

(b) . . . with respect to the allegations relating to infringements of trade union rights in Chimborazo province, to request the Government once more to furnish its observations at the earliest possible date.

538. In its above-mentioned letter of 27 August 1965 the Government states only, with respect to this allegation, that all workers' organisations have enjoyed and continue to enjoy freedom in exercising their rights within the framework of the law.

539. The Committee considers that the complainants' allegations in this regard do not contain sufficiently definite statements, specifying acts ascribed to the authority against which the complaint is made, which could provide substance for the examination of this aspect of the case. For instance, the complaint does not contain such allegations as refusal to register a union, or dissolution of a union, or prohibition of meetings, nor does it allege any specific act which might prevent or hinder the free exercise of the right to organise or to bargain collectively. The Committee recalls that other allegations made in this case, regarding the intervention of the authorities in a conflict which had arisen on the Huayllamba estate in the province of Chimborazo, have already been the subject of a definitive recommendation by the Committee.[1] Accordingly, and without prejudice to any complaints which may be made in the future with regard to this same matter, the Committee recommends the Governing Body to take note of the Government's reply and to decide, with the above reservation, that there is no object in continuing to examine this aspect of the case.

540. In these circumstances the Committee recommends the Governing Body—

(a) with respect to the allegations regarding infringement of trade union rights in the province of Chimborazo, to take note of the statements made by the Government in its letter of 27 August and to decide, with the reservation expressed in paragraph 539 above, that there is no object in continuing to examine this aspect of the case;

(b) with respect to the allegations regarding the arrest of the trade union leaders Francisco Checa, Carlos Aroca, Pedro Moreno Rocha, Carlos Idovro Vergara, Mesías Zamora Pérez, Hugo Espinosa, Luis Cajas and Teodoro Reinoso, to take note of the statements made by the Government in the same letter and to ask the Government to send as soon as possible more complete information on this aspect of the case, including an account of the offences with which each of the trade unionists whose names are cited has been charged, and the result of the proceedings, and the text of any judgments given with their grounds;

(c) to take note of this interim report on the understanding that the Committee will submit a further report as soon as it has received the additional information for which the Government is to be asked.

Case No. 442 :

Complaint Presented by the Autonomous Trade Union Federation of Guatemala against the Government of Guatemala

541. The complaint by the Autonomous Trade Union Federation of Guatemala (FASGUA) was submitted in a letter dated 11 May 1965. This letter was duly forwarded to the Government, which sent in its observations on 16 June 1965. The complainants have not made use of the right to submit additional information in support of their complaint.

542. Guatemala has ratified the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), and the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98).

[1] See 83rd Report, paras. 385 and 386 (a).

543. The complaint alleges that although the Government authorised the May Day celebrations in the capital two days before the event, it prohibited them in the rest of the country. The complainants state that the authorisation given to FASGUA to hold a parade and a meeting in the capital was in fact worthless because the parade took place under the control of the police who, on the pretext that elements hostile to the Government and unconnected with the workers' organisations were distributing printed May Day greetings to the workers, broke up the parade and arrested the main trade union leaders. The following were arrested and are stated to be still in prison: Miguel Valdez Girón, Gilberto Barillas and Francisco de Jesús Mayén, members of the executive committee of FASGUA; and Antonio Ovando Sánchez, Marco Aurelio García Benavente, Arturo Hernández, Elfego H. García, Alberto Bautista, Juan Lemus and others, former leaders or active members of the organisation. The arrest of Miguel Valdez Girón, Francisco de Jesús Mayén and Antonio Ovando Sánchez was alleged to have taken place only a few days after their release from prison, where they had been held in accordance with " security measures " taken under special legislation, by which the Government can detain citizens for up to six months without trial.

544. In its observations dated 16 June 1965 the Government states that since its installation it has laid down and strictly followed the principle that all citizens should be guaranteed their legal rights and it has at no time, not even when the democratic institutions of the country were threatened, pursued any aim other than that of safeguarding public order and well-being. The Government adds that it has had to cope with a number of difficult situations, such as the criminal attacks in which several of its officials have died, among them the former Deputy Minister of National Defence, but even so it has never taken repressive action.

545. The Government states that the complaint is unfounded. The May Day parade this year was carried out without any hindrance and no restrictions were placed on it. As regards the arrest of trade union leaders the Government states generally that the Guatemalan Constitution safeguards the autonomy of the judiciary and courts and that nobody is arrested in Guatemala unless he has committed an offence. It points out that the functions of trade union leadership do not exempt any person from compliance with the laws of the land or from the jurisdiction of the courts which are competent to judge unlawful actions, and that while the Government collaborates with the trade union movement it cannot grant privileged legal status to trade union leaders who so far forget their responsibilities as to engage in unlawful acts. The Government concludes that it will ask the appropriate authorities for details concerning the allegation and that, if the I.L.O. wishes, it will forward particulars of the charges against the individuals in question.

546. In various earlier cases the Committee has stated that the right to call public meetings, especially on May Day, is an important aspect of trade union rights.[1]

547. The Committee observes that, in reply to the complainants' allegation that the Government allowed May Day to be celebrated in the capital but not in the remainder of the country, the Government replies that in fact no restriction was imposed. The complainants have not submitted any evidence, nor have they availed themselves of their right to submit additional information in support of their complaint. Accordingly, the Committee considers that no useful purpose would be served by continuing its examination of this allegation.

548. In these circumstances and for the reasons given in the preceding paragraph, the Committee recommends the Governing Body to take note of the Government's statement that no restriction was imposed on the celebration of May Day this year and to decide that no useful purpose would be served by continuing its examination of this aspect of the case.

[1] See Third Report, Case No. 17 (France-Tunisia), para. 51; Sixth Report, Case No. 40 (France-Tunisia), para. 487; 12th Report, Case No. 16 (France-Morocco), paras. 399-406; 15th Report, Case No. 99 (France), paras. 21-28.

549. As regards the complainants' allegations that as a result of the May Day parade a number of trade unionists, nine of whom are named in the complaint, were arrested, and that the legislation in force in Guatemala, under the heading of security measures, makes it possible to keep persons under arrest for six months without bringing them to trial and that three trade unionists (see paragraph 543 above) have been held by virtue of these powers, the Committee observes that the Government's reply appears to refer to these allegations only indirectly.

550. One of the principles laid down under the procedure for examining allegations concerning the breach of trade union rights is that, when detailed allegations are submitted, the Committee cannot be satisfied with replies from governments which confine themselves to comments of a general character.[1] In this case the Committee welcomes the Government's statement that it will ask the appropriate authorities to supply the information needed to ascertain the truth about the complaint.

551. In these circumstances the Committee recommends the Governing Body to take note of the fact that the Government intends to ask the appropriate authorities to supply the information needed to ascertain the truth about the complaint and to ask the Government to be good enough to forward, as soon as possible, its specific observations on the allegations referred to in the previous paragraph with, in particular, precise information concerning the position vis-à-vis the courts of the following trade unionists: Miguel Valdez Girón, Gilberto Barillas, Francisco de Jesús Mayén, Antonio Ovando Sánchez, Marco Aurelio García Benavente, Arturo Hernández, Elfego H. García, Alberto Bautista and Juan Lemus; and to decide to postpone its examination of this aspect of the case until it has received these specific observations and details from the Government.

552. In all the circumstances and with regard to the case as a whole the Committee recommends the Governing Body—

(a) with respect to the alleged prohibition of trade union meetings to celebrate May Day this year, to take note of the Government's statement that no restrictions were imposed on this commemoration and to decide that no useful purpose would be served by continuing its examination of this aspect of the case;

(b) with respect to the complainants' allegations that as a result of the parade on May Day this year a number of trade unionists were arrested and that legislation is in force in Guatemala—and has been applied to three trade unionists—which makes it possible to keep persons under arrest for up to six months without trial, to note that the Government will ask the appropriate authorities to supply the information needed to ascertain the truth about the complaint and to request the Government to be good enough to forward, as soon as possible, its specific observations on these allegations, giving details, in particular, about the position of the trade unionists whose names are listed in paragraph 551 above;

(c) to take note of the present interim report, it being understood that the Committee will submit a further report on this case when it has received the observations and information requested from the Government in subparagraph (b) above.

Geneva, 11 November 1965. (Signed) Roberto AGO,
Chairman.

Reports of the Governing Body Committee on Freedom of Association

Eighty-sixth Report [1]

INTRODUCTION

1. The Committee on Freedom of Association set up by the Governing Body at its 117th Session (November 1951) met at the International Labour Office, Geneva, on 8 and 9 November 1965, under the chairmanship of Mr. Roberto Ago, former Chairman of the Governing Body. The members of the Committee of Belgian, Indian, Irish and Moroccan nationality were not present during its examination of the cases relating to Belgium (Case No. 376), India (Cases Nos. 420, 424 and 436), Ireland (Case No. 455) and Morocco (Case No. 445) respectively.

2. In accordance with the procedure laid down in paragraph 12 of its 29th Report, as amended by paragraph 5 of its 43rd Report, the Committee recommends the Governing Body to examine the present report at its 164th Session.[1]

3. The Committee considered—(a) 21 cases in which the complaints had been communicated to the governments concerned for their observations, namely the cases relating to Belgium (Case No. 376), Japan (Case No. 398), Pakistan (Case No. 407), Honduras (Case No. 408), Bolivia (Case No. 409), India (Cases Nos. 420 and 424), United States (Puerto Rico) (Case No. 430), Malta (Case No. 431), India (Case No. 436), Congo (Leopoldville) (Case No. 437), Greece (Case No. 438), Paraguay (Case No. 439), Costa Rica (Case No. 444), Morocco (Case No. 445), Panama (Case No. 446), Uganda (Case No. 448), United Kingdom (St. Christopher Nevis-Anguilla) (Case No. 449), Bolivia (Case No. 451), Honduras (Case No. 454), and Ireland (Case No. 455), and (b) a complaint relating to the Dominican Republic (Case No. 428), which was submitted to the Committee for opinion prior to being communicated to the government concerned.

Cases the Examination of Which the Committee Has Adjourned

4. The Committee adjourned until its next session its examination of the cases relating to India (Case No. 436), Paraguay (Case No. 439), Morocco (Case No. 445), Panama (Case No. 446), Uganda (Case No. 448), United Kingdom (St. Christopher Nevis-Anguilla) (Case No. 449), Honduras (Case No. 454) and Ireland (Case No. 455), in which it has not yet received the observations of the governments concerned. With regard to the case relating to India (Case No. 436) the Committee took note of a communication from the government concerned stating that it was awaiting the outcome of pending judicial proceedings before forwarding its observations; with regard to the case relating to Uganda (Case No. 448) the Committee took note of a communication from the government concerned stating that its observations would be forwarded; with regard to the case relating to Panama (Case No. 446) the Committee took note of a communication from the government concerned stating that it was awaiting information from the competent authorities.

5. The Committee adjourned until its next session the case relating to Bolivia (Case No. 409), with respect to which it is still awaiting information previously requested from the government concerned, and the case relating to Japan (Case No. 398), with respect to which the Committee has requested the Director-General to obtain further information from the government concerned before it formulates its recommendations to the Governing Body.

6. The Committee also adjourned until its next session its examination of the cases relating to Belgium (Case No. 376), Pakistan (Case No. 407), Honduras (Case No. 408), Congo (Leopoldville) (Case No. 437) and Costa Rica (Case No. 444).

Cases in Which the Committee Submits Its Conclusions to the Governing Body

7. In the present report the Committee submits for the approval of the Governing Body the conclusions which it has now reached concerning the remaining cases before it, namely the cases relating to India (Cases Nos. 420 and 424), United States (Puerto Rico) (Case No. 430), Malta (Case No. 431), Greece (Case No. 438), and Bolivia (Case No. 451), and the complaint relating to the Dominican Republic (Case No. 428), which was submitted to the Committee for opinion. These conclusions may be briefly summarised as follows:

(a) the Committee recommends that the complaint relating to the Dominican Republic (Case No. 428), which was submitted to it for opinion, should, for the reasons indicated in paragraphs 8 to 11 of this report, be dismissed without being communicated to the government concerned;

[1] The 86th, 87th and 88th Reports of the Committee on Freedom of Association were examined and approved by the Governing Body at its 164th Session (February-March 1966).

(b) the Committee recommends that, for the reasons indicated in paragraphs 12 to 84 of this report, the cases relating to India (Case No. 424), United States (Puerto Rico) (Case No. 430), Malta (Case No. 431) and Greece (Case No. 438) should be dismissed as not calling for further examination;

(c) with regard to the cases relating to India (Case No. 420) and Bolivia (Case No. 451), the Committee, for the reasons indicated in paragraphs 85 to 154 of this report, has presented an interim report stating certain conclusions to which it wishes to draw the attention of the Governing Body.

Complaint Which the Committee Recommends Should Be Dismissed without Being Communicated to the Government Concerned

Case No. 428 :

Complaint Presented by the Association of Independent Taxi-Drivers of Santo Domingo against the Government of the Dominican Republic

8. By a letter dated 12 January 1965 the Association of Independent Taxi-Drivers of Santo Domingo alleged, in very general terms and without giving any details, that trade union and human rights are violated in the Dominican Republic and requested the I.L.O. to send a representative to confirm the truth of the allegations on the spot.

9. Before transmitting the complaint to the Government of the Dominican Republic the Director-General, by a letter dated 27 January 1965, informed the organisation in question that any further information which it might care to submit in substantiation of its complaint should be forwarded to him within a period of one month. No communication containing additional information has so far been received from the Association of Independent Taxi-Drivers.

10. In accordance with the procedure in force [1] the Director-General decided to submit the complaint to the Committee for its opinion as to whether it was sufficiently substantiated to justify him in communicating it to the government concerned.

11. As the complainants have not availed themselves of the opportunity offered to them to furnish further information in substantiation of their complaint, which is couched in terms too vague to permit of an examination of the matter on its merits, the Committee recommends the Governing Body to decide that the complaint should be dismissed without being communicated to the government concerned.

Cases Which the Committee Considers Do Not Call for Further Examination

Case No. 424 :

Complaint Presented by the Miners' Trade Unions International (Trade Department of the World Federation of Trade Unions) against the Government of India

12. The complaint of the Miners' Trade Unions International is contained in a communication addressed directly to the I.L.O. on 10 December 1964. The Government of India furnished its observations on the complaint by a letter dated 12 April 1965.

---

[1] See Ninth Report, para. 23 (d).

13. India has not ratified either the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), or the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98).

Allegations relating to Anti-Union Discrimination

14. The complainants allege that repressive and discriminatory measures are taken against officers and members of unions affiliated to the Mineworkers' Federation of India (All India Trade Union Congress). One of each operates at the Bankola mine and the Babisole mine. These are referred to by the complainants as " Red Flag Unions ".

15. It is alleged that the management of the Bankola mine, West Bengal, is trying to crush the Red Flag Union. Mr. B. Kurmi, a member, is alleged to have been brutally attacked on 12 September 1964 and then falsely charged with theft by the manager of the mine, Mr. Sharma. Mr. Sharma is alleged to have led, on 17 September 1964, a crowd of gangsters who set fire to workers' dwellings. The police arrived and arrested some 30 officers of the Red Flag Union but, states the complainant, the manager himself was arrested on 19 September. A week later the General Secretary and Committee Secretary of the Coal Miners' Federation of West Bengal were arrested, but later released on bail. Since then, it is alleged, the management has recruited criminal elements to harass the miners.

16. At the Babisole mine, West Bengal, it is alleged, about 100 officers of the Red Flag Union have been victimised. The management is said to be reducing production by dismissing permanent workers and refusing them their legal dues. Nine officers of the union are said to have been falsely charged in four legal actions. An armed police picket has been placed in the mine. It is alleged that when the management complains about a worker he is arrested at once by the police before inquiries are started, but that complaints by workers are rejected by the police. One member, Mr. Nandi, is alleged to have been arrested when he tried to lodge a complaint with the police.

17. The situation is alleged to be the same at the Girimint, Adjay, New Jemehary Khas and Chapui Khas mines.

18. The Government declares that all the mines referred to are in the throes of severe labour indiscipline because of the struggle for recognition between rival unions.

19. At the Bankola mine 400 of the 2,000 workers belong to the Colliery Mazdoor Congress (affiliated to the Hind Mazdoor Sabha), which has been recognised by the management. The union affiliated to the All India Trade Union Congress (A.I.T.U.C.) has about 150 members and has not been recognised. Rivalry between the two unions has caused open disorder and the police have had to intervene. The Government says that a similar situation prevails in other mines.

20. In September 1964 the A.I.T.U.C. union complained that persons hired by the Bankola colliery management had attacked workers' quarters and leaders of the union on 12 September. This was found to be untrue. The Deputy Chief Inspector of Mines investigated the alleged attack on Mr. Kurmi but found no evidence. A charge against him of having stolen a drill machine is pending in the court. As regards the setting on fire of workers' dwellings on 17 September 1964, about 55 workers of different groups (not 30 union officers, as alleged) were arrested and several cases connected with this incident are pending in the courts. To avoid future incidents, the manager of the mine was transferred from the district. The allegation relating to the recruitment of criminal elements to harass the miners, says the Government, has been found to be baseless and no complaint on this point has been made by the Hind Mazdoor Sabha union.

21. As regards the alleged victimisation of officers of the A.I.T.U.C. union at the Babisole colliery, the Government states that the only complaint received was one relating to Mr. H. Singh. It was found that he had been assaulted by an aggrieved workman. The A.I.T.U.C. union withdrew its complaints.

22. As regards the alleged lay-off of permanent workers, the Government states that two seams were closed from 8 September to 14 September 1964 and an open-cast quarry was closed from 8 to 19 September. On investigation it was found that the two seams were closed by order of the Mines Department because of violations of the Mines Act. The quarry was closed because water had rendered it unsafe. Most of the 130 workers affected were given alternative work as opportunity arose and only 15 had to be retrenched. The management had failed to pay minimum guaranteed wages to the workers concerned, as required by the Coal Award of 1956, and this matter had been taken up by the Regional Labour Commissioner.

23. Although no complaint had been received from the union regarding the arrest of Mr. Nandi (see paragraph 16 above), the Government states that a complaint charging him with obstructing the manager and director of the Babisole mine is pending before a court.

24. While pointing out that the complainants have not cited any specific cases to support their allegations regarding other collieries, the Government states that in September 1964 the A.I.T.U.C. union lodged a complaint of terrorisation of workers at the Chapui Khas colliery. On investigation it was found that three members of the union had beaten up a member of the rival union and had been suspended for ten days. Two other complaints of assault of union leaders are under investigation.

25. It would appear that in the collieries concerned an inter-union struggle is being waged, often with violence, between members of two rival unions of miners. Certain cases of violence and arson have given rise to criminal court proceedings. So far as these cases are concerned no sufficient evidence appears to have been furnished to prove that the employers as such were implicated in what took place. So far as the closure of certain seams is concerned, this appears to have been done for justifiable reasons not connected with the exercise of trade union rights. The only provable fault on the part of the employers appears to have been failure to pay minimum wages to certain workers who were laid off and this, according to the Government, is being dealt with in accordance with the legal procedure laid down. In these circumstances, the Committee does not consider that the complainants have furnished sufficient proof that violations of trade union rights have been committed by the employers, the police or other authorities.

26. The Committee therefore recommends the Governing Body to decide that these allegations do not call for further examination.

Allegations relating to the Food Situation

27. It is alleged that essential foodstuffs have disappeared from the market in the mining areas and been cornered by black marketeers, who charge the workers exorbitant prices. Miners have to absent themselves and lose wages in order to find food. Employers agreed to open shops with reasonable prices but, it is alleged, no mine owners have done so. There are a few co-operative shops in the mines but they cannot get adequate supplies.

28. The Government states that there has been a shortage of grain for some time and the rise in commodity prices has caused hardship to the whole population as well as the miners. So far as the miners are concerned account was taken of this in the Coal Award of 1956 and two wage increases were accorded by the Coal Mining Wage Board in the last two years. In 1962 the Indian Labour Conference evolved as a relief measure a scheme to open fair-price stores in larger undertakings. Two hundred and sixty co-operative stores have been set up in the mining areas and the question of supplies is being given constant attention.

29. These allegations raise questions related to difficulties of food supply being experienced in India which do not appear to be directly related to the exercise of trade union rights, and the Committee accordingly recommends the Governing Body to decide that they do not call for further examination.

Allegations relating to Bonus Payments

30. The complainants allege that mine owners in the private and public sectors have never paid a production bonus, although the Government accepted the decision of the Bonus Commission that mine owners should pay a bonus to the miners. The Mineworkers' Federation of India has threatened direct action if bonuses are not paid to India's 4 million miners.

31. The Government states that under the statutory system prevalent in coal mines bonus is paid on the basis of quarterly attendance. In December 1961 the Government appointed a Bonus Commission to work out norms governing bonus payments based on profits in all industries. In January 1964 the Commission made its recommendations, which were accepted by the Government, with some modifications, in September 1964. Details of proposed legislation to give effect to the Commission's recommendations in the form accepted were discussed by the Standing Labour Committee in December 1964 and March 1965, but no agreement was reached between employers and workers. The Government has decided to proceed with the enactment of the Bonus Bill, taking account of the different views expressed.

32. It does not appear that, either under the law or under any binding award or agreement, employers are bound to pay a production bonus, although legislation is contemplated, and at present bonuses are paid on the basis of quarterly attendance. In these circumstances the complainants have not shown that the non-payment of a production bonus has infringed trade union rights or any acquired rights of the workers.

33. The Committee therefore recommends the Governing Body to decide that these allegations do not call for further examination.

* * *

34. In all the circumstances the Committee recommends the Governing Body to decide that the case does not call for further examination.

Case No. 430 :

Complaint Presented by the Latin American Confederation of Christian Trade Unionists against the Government of the United States in respect of Puerto Rico

35. The complaint of the Latin American Confederation of Christian Trade Unionists (C.L.A.S.C.) is contained in a communication addressed directly to the I.L.O. on 27 February 1965. The Government of the United States furnished its observations in two communications dated 5 May and 26 July 1965.

36. The United States has not ratified the Right of Association (Non-Metropolitan Territories) Convention, 1947 (No. 84), the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), or the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98).

Allegations relating to a Strike of Employees of the Sundale Manufacturing Corporation

37. The complainants state that from 30 September 1964 onwards the Puerto Rican Federation of Democratic Trade Unions met with executives of the Sundale Manufacturing Corporation, Ponce, in efforts to negotiate an agreement for its employees. As these efforts failed, the Conciliation Office was asked to intervene, but, it is alleged, the employers refused conciliation. An indefinite strike began on 23 November 1964.

38. Subsequently, the owners of the firm came to Puerto Rico and further negotiation took place but, it is alleged, the manager of the firm brought up matters not connected with the dispute and prevented an agreement being reached. Further negotiations were also inconclusive. On 30 January 1965 the factory was closed for economic reasons.

39. On 8 February 1965, say the complainants, a truck attempted to cross the picket line, which had been there for 78 days. Pickets persuaded the driver not to enter the factory. On 9 February police arrived at the picket and, it is alleged, a truck then arrived, the driver of which was accompanied by a special policeman. According to the complainants, a police lieutenant ordered the driver to enter and forbade the pickets to speak to him, this being contrary to the law, which permits peaceful persuasion by pickets. However, it is alleged, the commander of the police persisted in ordering the driver to enter and, when the pickets tried to speak to him, one of them was arrested, and a striker, Mrs. Justina Cruz, was also arrested because she protested. It is alleged further that another picket, Mr. Vera Vera, was arrested and beaten and that Miss Iris Santiago, a further picket arrested for protesting, was beaten and dragged along the street. Another union member, Mr. F. Velázquez, was also arrested. Afterwards, public protests were organised.

40. In its communication dated 5 May 1965 the Government of the United States explained that the Constitution and laws of Puerto Rico guarantee and protect the right to strike and that the right to picket and to dissuade persons from working is also protected, but that the right to use force to prevent the crossing of a picket line is not protected.

41. The Government stated that an investigation of the incidents occurring during the strike was being undertaken by the District Attorney of the city of Ponce, that an investigation had also been ordered by the Legislative Assembly of Puerto Rico, and that the Government was prepared to obtain information on the factual issues from the competent authorities, if the Committee so desired.

42. At its meeting in May 1965 the Committee decided to request the Government to be good enough to forward an official factual statement on the matter from the competent authorities and, in particular, to inform the Committee as to the outcome of the investigation being made by the District Attorney of Ponce and of that ordered by the Legislative Assembly of Puerto Rico.

43. On 26 July 1965 the Government furnished a copy of a report on the matter from the Office of the Attorney-General in San Juan, based on the investigation made by the District Attorney of Ponce.

44. The District Attorney took sworn statements from four police officers involved and statements from seven strikers or union officials.

45. The investigation shows, says the Government, that on 9 February 1965, the day when the material factual incidents took place, Police Lieutenant Rovira Ramos was informed by a truck owner, Mr. F. Delgado, that his trucks would not be permitted to enter the factory premises, and that the lieutenant and other policemen went to the site. A truck arrived and, according to the report, Mr. Velázquez and some of the strikers tried unsuccessfully to persuade the driver not to enter the factory. When the truck moved forward, it is stated, Mr. Velázquez stood in front of it, used foul language and stated that no truck would be allowed to enter. He was arrested for breach of the peace by Police Officer Osvaldo Vélez and then tried to escape and was chased by the officer. At this point, says the report, Mrs. Justina Ortiz (not Cruz) assaulted the officer with a cudgel and was arrested. She resisted, and some women strikers, including Miss Iris Santiago, started shouting and moved in front of the moving truck. The police pushed them aside to prevent them being knocked down.

46. Later in the same day, according to the report, Mr. Vera Vera, a union leader, threw a rock at a truck leaving the factory, breaking the windscreen. He was arrested, and some of the strikers, including Miss Iris Santiago, tried to obstruct the police. Miss Santiago was charged with a violation of article 137 of the Penal Code concerning the obstruction of justice.

47. In the ensuing trials in the courts Mrs. Justina Ortiz was found guilty of aggravated assault and battery and fined 25 dollars; Mr. Velázquez was sentenced to a fine of 50 dollars or 60 days in jail; Mr. Vera Vera was found guilty before a jury on a charge of preventing a police officer from performing his duties, a felony. Miss Santiago, charged with resisting a police officer, was acquitted.

48. The Committee has always applied the principle that allegations relating to the right to strike are not outside its competence in so far as they affect the exercise of trade union rights.[1] It has also pointed out that the right of workers and their organisations to strike as a legitimate means of defending their occupational interests is generally recognised.[2] The Committee has also emphasised the importance that it attaches to the principle that pickets acting in accordance with the law should not be subject to interference by the public authorities.[3]

49. In the present case it appears that three of the four persons arrested by the police for acts in violation of the Penal Code were eventually found guilty by the courts. The fourth was acquitted on a relatively minor charge.

50. The only point on which there is real conflict of evidence is whether or not the police interfered with the right of peaceful picketing and the right to try to dissuade workers from working, rights which are guaranteed by the laws of Puerto Rico. According to the complainants the police forbade strikers on 9 February 1965 to try to persuade a truck driver not to enter the factory. According to the report of the District Attorney of Ponce they were not prevented from speaking to the truck driver, but they failed to persuade him. In respect to this question as to credibility it is to be observed that no one tried to prevent the strikers from persuading a truck driver on 8 February and that, on that day, the picket lines had been operating for 78 days without any complaint of interference with them ever having been made.

51. In all the circumstances, and having regard to the fact that the right to strike and to picket peacefully are guaranteed by the law, the Committee does not consider that the complainants have offered sufficient proof in support of their allegations that the rights in question were violated.

52. In view of the nature of the report furnished by the District Attorney of Ponce and of the verdicts given by the courts the Committee does not now consider it necessary to await the outcome of the parallel investigation ordered by the Legislative Assembly of Puerto Rico before formulating its conclusions.

53. The Committee therefore recommends the Governing Body to decide that these allegations do not call for further examination.

Allegations relating to the Legislation of Puerto Rico

54. The complainants allege that the laws are one-sided and favour the employers and ask where is the right to strike embodied in the laws and where is the right of association if fear of the employers prevents the workers from organising freely.

[3] See 25th Report, Case No. 136 (United Kingdom-Cyprus), para. 170.

55. In its communication dated 5 May 1965 the Government refers to the specific provisions in the Constitution and the legislation which guarantee the right to strike and the right to organise and prohibit reprisal by employers. Charges of violation of these rights can be filed with the Puerto Rican Labor Relations Board. Copies of the relevant provisions have been furnished.

56. The allegations made are in such general terms and not supported by any specific illustrations that the Committee feels that it is quite unnecessary to examine the legislation in greater detail, considering that the allegations are too vague to permit of an examination of them on their merits.

57. The Committee therefore recommends the Governing Body to decide that these allegations do not call for further examination.

58. In these circumstances the Committee recommends the Governing Body to decide that the case does not call for further examination.

Case No. 431 :

Complaint Presented by the Malta Customs Federation and the Customs and Excise Officers' Association against the Government of Malta

59. The complaint is contained in a telegram dated 13 February 1965 addressed to the I.L.O. by the Malta Customs Federation and in a communication dated 25 March 1965 submitted jointly by that organisation and the Customs and Excise Officers' Association, Malta. The Government of Malta furnished its observations on the complaint by a communication dated 22 May 1965.

60. Malta ratified both the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), and the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), on 4 January 1965.

61. The two complaining unions, which organise customs officers in the landing and warehousing branch and the customs and excise branch respectively, have set up a joint committee, with a view to obtaining better promotion prospects for customs officers. On 11 January 1964 they asked the Government for a closed-shop agreement, so that senior posts in the customs department would be reserved for customs officers and closed to members of the general service. Executive and administrative officers of the general service in Malta are organised by the Society of Administrative and Executive Civil Servants.

62. After making threats of industrial action the complainants held discussions with the Government on 15 April, 11 September and 3 December 1964, and on the last occasion, it is alleged, the Government promised to " finalise the claim " in the first week of January 1965. However, nothing further had happened by the third week in January 1965 and the complainants decided to order a ban on overtime and working to rule as from midnight on 24-25 January 1965.

63. On 23 January the Government informed the complainants that the filling of existing senior posts and the provisions of additional such posts were matters of managerial prerogative and could not therefore be the subject of agreement or industrial disputes. At the same time the Government offered to create five senior posts. As a counter-proposal the complainants asked for ten posts and certain improvements in promotion.

64. At this point the Society of Administrative and Executive Civil Servants entered the field. Considering that the complaining unions were trying to reserve exclusively for their members higher posts to which general service officials in the Society could also legitimately aspire, the Society, it is alleged, sent a written undertaking to the Government that its members would be prepared to do the work of the customs even in the event of direct action.

65. When industrial action began, it is alleged, the Government set in motion a plan under which officers of the general service " were made to take over from customs officers to perform work outside office hours ". This helped to render ineffective the ban on overtime from 25 January to 24 February 1965.

66. The complainants also contend that the Society's offer to the Government was contrary to " work to rule " restrictions issued by the staff side of the Malta Government Joint Council. The General Workers' Union, the biggest union in Malta, on the other hand, had supported the complainants by ordering those of its members who were customs and excise guards not to undertake any work which was not previously done by them.

67. On 29 January 1965 the complainants informed the Government that they were contemplating more drastic measures because " civil servants directly interested in the dispute were being ordered to perform work normally done by customs officers ". It is alleged that, encouraged by the support of the Society, the Government issued statements commending members of the general service and condemning the customs men and threatening the latter with disciplinary action.

68. The Malta Customs Federation and the Society are both affiliated to the Confederation of Malta Trade Unions. On 1 February 1965 the Federation informed the General Council of the Society's alleged offer to the Government to help to break the strike. The General Council appointed a conciliation commission, but it could not effect a settlement. In the end, it is said, the General Council decided " to censor privately the Society ".

69. On 22 February 1965 discussions with the Government were reopened. The complainants concluded an agreement with the Government and the dispute ended on 24 February. According to this agreement the Government approved various appointments and the creation of four additional senior posts, provision was made for automatic promotion of junior officers after five years' service, and both sides agreed " to refrain from disciplinary action ".

70. In conclusion the complainants ask the I.L.O. to censor the Society of Administrative and Executive Civil Servants and to condemn the offer which it made to the Government.

71. In its communication dated 22 May 1965 the Government states that the complaint is directed against another union and that the alleged infringement of trade union rights " is not and cannot be attributed to the Government ". In these circumstances the Government does not wish to comment on the substance of the complaint. The Government furnishes a letter received from the Confederation of Malta Trade Unions in which the latter states that it does not concur in the complaint.

72. It appears that the complaining organisations sought a closed-shop agreement for the main purpose of ensuring that promotion to higher customs posts should be reserved for their members. They resorted to direct action in the form of working to rule and banning overtime. The attempt to secure a closed shop was resisted by another organisation, catering for general service personnel, which wished to retain for its members the possibility of access to the posts in question. In order to weaken the direct action by the customs men, the general service organisation voluntarily offered to instruct its members to perform the overtime work normally done by customs officers. Essentially, therefore, the case revolves around the issue of union security arrangements and involves an inter-union struggle over this issue.

73. In the past [1] the Committee has declined to entertain allegations relating to voluntarily concluded union security arrangements, basing its reasoning on the statement in the report of the Committee on Industrial Relations set up by the International Labour Conference in 1949 [1] that the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), could in no way be interpreted as authorising or prohibiting union security arrangements, such questions being matters for regulation in accordance with national practice. In those cases the Committee has rejected not only allegations relating to union security arrangements already effected by collective agreement but also, as in Case No. 182 relating to the United Kingdom [2], allegations relating to inter-union disputes occasioned by the fact that, as in the present case, one union was " exerting pressure to secure what, if it should be successful, would be a closed shop and a union security arrangement in fact ".

[1] See 13th Report, Case No. 96 (United Kingdom), paras. 115-139; 15th Report, Case No. 114 (United States), paras. 36-64, and Case No. 102 (Union of South Africa), paras. 166-174; 17th Report, Case No. 120 (France), paras. 78-98; 26th Report, Case No. 162 (United Kingdom), paras. 12-19; 30th Report, Case No. 182 (United Kingdom), paras. 101-108.

74. In these circumstances the Committee recommends the Governing Body to decide that the allegations do not call for further examination.

Case No. 438 :

Complaint Presented by the Pan-Hellenic Federation of Workers in Electricity and Public Utility Undertakings against the Government of Greece

75. The complaint of the Pan-Hellenic Federation of Workers in Electricity and Public Utility Undertakings is contained in a telegram addressed directly to the I.L.O. on 16 April 1965. Although informed of their right to supply additional information to substantiate their allegations, the complainants have not done so. The complaint was transmitted for comment to the Government, which replied by a communication dated 27 July 1965.

76. Greece has ratified both the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), and the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98).

77. The complainants allege that a strike called for on 15 and 16 April 1965 by the employees of the Athens and Piraeus public electricity undertaking was broken by the Government, which subjected the workers to " political mobilisation "—an unconstitutional measure in the view of the complainants—and arrested about 30 strikers.

78. In its observations the Government confirms having requisitioned workers. It explains, however, that such action was taken only in respect of a limited number of the staff, namely the technical staff whose presence was vitally necessary to keep the turbines running. The Government adds that the action in question was taken to implement a decision of the Minister for Industry, which was itself based on provisions of the legislation in force which lay down that " requisition measures in respect of staff shall be ordered by the competent ministers, after the Prime Minister has so decided, with the aim of coping with situations of all kinds which might hinder economic development or which might jeopardise the normal life of the State or the social life of the country ".

79. The Government declares that its intention, when it ordered the measure of requisition, was not to infringe freedom of association or the right to strike, but purely " to ensure adequate protection of the public and avoid perturbations in the economic development of the country ". The Government adds that, generally speaking, " the requisitioning of the staff of a public utility undertaking placed in entirely exceptional circumstances of urgent necessity is only ordered very rarely and when there are no other means of ensuring the functioning of that undertaking ".

[2] See 30th Report, para. 108.

80. On a number of occasions in the past the Committee has had occasion to examine cases having similar or comparable features.[1] In those cases the Committee noted that the requisition of workers was of an exceptional nature in a labour dispute in view of the gravity of its consequences with regard to personal freedoms and trade union rights. It also considered that measures such as the requisition of workers on the occasion of a labour dispute could be justified only by the need to ensure the working of essential services or industries whose suspension would lead to an acute crisis.

81. In the present case it is difficult to determine whether the stopping of the turbines, which according to the Government would have resulted in the cutting off of electric current, the bringing to a standstill of urban transport, etc., would have led to an " acute crisis ". However, since the Government declares that the measure of requisition in question—to which, moreover, recourse is very rarely had as a general rule—was not intended as a deliberate strike-breaking measure or as an infringement of freedom of association, the Committee recommends the Governing Body, while drawing the Government's attention to the observations made in paragraph 80 above, to decide that this aspect of the case does not call for further examination.

82. As regards the arrests alleged to have been made, the Government states that the persons who after the requisition did not return to work were arrested and detained for 24 hours. Although sentenced to detention by the judge of first instance before whom they appeared, according to the Government they were acquitted on appeal.

83. In these circumstances, the persons concerned having been released, the Committee considers that no useful purpose would be served by continuing its examination of this aspect of the case and recommends the Governing Body to consider it as closed.

84. As regards the case as a whole the Committee recommends the Governing Body—

(a) to draw the Government's attention to the fact that the requisition of workers should be only of an exceptional nature in a labour dispute in view of the gravity of its consequences with regard to personal freedoms and trade union rights;

(b) to decide, subject to the above reservation, that the case does not call for further examination.

Interim Conclusions in the Cases relating to India (Case No. 420) and Bolivia (Case No. 451)

Case No. 420 :

Complaint Presented by the Calcutta Port Commissioners Workers' Union against the Government of India

85. The complaint of the Calcutta Port Commissioners Workers' Union is contained in three communications dated 21 October and 26 December 1964 and 6 April 1965. The Government of India furnished its observations thereon by two communications dated 17 April and 28 September 1965.

86. India has ratified neither the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), nor the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98).

Allegations relating to Workers' Housing Rights

87. In their communications dated 21 October and 26 December 1964 the complainants state that the Commissioners for the Port of Calcutta, a central government undertaking, employ about 30,000 Class IV employees, entitled under the Rules of the Commissioners to rent-free quarters or a house rent allowance in lieu thereof. It is alleged that responsible officers of the Port Authority have been making illegal profits by letting outsiders occupy quarters and that the Authority as such has been allowing Class III workers to occupy Class IV quarters at a higher rent. On 6 April 1965 the complainants furnished details of a housing case affecting a member of the union employed as a carpenter.

88. In its communication dated 17 April 1965 the Government states that the Port Commissioners have 3,600 rent-free quarters for their Class IV employees. They have also a number of quarters for Class III employees, who pay 10 per cent. of their wages as rent. Under the rules, only permanent Class IV employees are entitled to quarters and a waiting list is maintained, quarters being allotted strictly according to priority on the list. No outsiders, says the Government, are allotted quarters, but some of those given quarters sub-let their quarters or share them with outsiders, and those who do this are evicted. Some Class IV employees, including the person referred to in the communication dated 6 April 1965, were upgraded to Class III and were allowed to stay on in their old quarters at a token rent.

89. The allegations relate in short to what are regarded by the complainants as irregularities in the allotment of quarters to Class IV employees. No evidence has been adduced by the complainants to show that in regard to housing allotments any discrimination has been practised on trade union grounds or otherwise or that any subsisting collective agreement has been violated.

90. In these circumstances the Committee recommends the Governing Body to decide that these allegations do not call for further examination.

Allegations relating to an Infringement of the Industrial Disputes Act, 1947

91. The complaining organisation raised an industrial dispute before the Regional Labour Commissioner, in the manner prescribed, over the workers' housing question. While the dispute was pending, it is alleged, the authorities made an agreement with another union providing for the payment of rent allowance to a category of workers employed as porters. These persons were " A category " workers entitled to 15 rupees house allowance since 1 October 1957, pursuant to a binding recommendation of the Classification and Categorisation Committee. The complainants consider that this agreement deprived the workers in question of their acquired rights and constituted a violation of section 33 of the Industrial Disputes Act, 1947, which provides that, during the continuation of conciliation or other proceedings regarding a dispute, conditions of service may not be changed. It is alleged that the authorities made the agreement in order to discredit the complaining organisation in the eyes of the porters in question.

92. The Government states that the porters in question were " A category " porters, who are piece-rated workers. As such they had not figured at all in the recommendation of the Classification and Categorisation Committee. To bring them into line with monthly-rated workers the Commissioners appointed a joint committee of their officers and representatives of the two recognised unions, the Calcutta Port Shramik Union and the National Union of Port Trust Employees, to examine their position. In accordance with their report, a revised incentive piece-rate scheme came into operation in February 1964 which gave these porters parity with other employees as regards rent allowances. They were also paid an indemnity retroactive to 1 October 1957. The Government states that the scheme was not implemented while conciliation proceedings were pending over a dispute raised by the complainants; there is therefore no truth in the allegation of violation of section 33 of the Industrial Disputes Act, 1947.

93. In these circumstances, having regard to the explanations given by the Government and observing also that the complainants themselves have not specified the dates between which the dispute raised by them was pending, the Committee considers that the complainants have not furnished sufficient proof in support of their allegations that section 33 of the Industrial Disputes Act, 1947, was infringed.

94. The Committee therefore recommends the Governing Body to decide that these allegations do not call for further examination.

Allegations relating to Disciplinary Measures against Workers Who Occupied Vacant Quarters

95. It is alleged that Class IV workers who were without quarters began to occupy any premises they found vacant. Most of those who did so were suspended, generally for two months. But, it is alleged, the authorities discriminated unfairly in this respect against the complaining organisation, 15 of whose members were suspended, on dates varying from 2 August 1963 to 2 February 1964, apart from one on 12 February 1963, for six or seven months, without any reason being given. The union raised a formal industrial dispute before the Regional Labour Commissioner challenging the validity of the measures taken. It is alleged that the Conciliation Officer ordered the Port Authority not to take departmental proceedings against the suspended workmen or change their other conditions of service but that, in violation of the order, the Authority did start proceedings against them and illegally stopped or reduced their subsistence allowance. The complainants furnished a purported copy of a letter dated 18 June 1964 from the Conciliation Officer to the Chief Labour Officer of the Calcutta Port Commissioner drawing his attention to the obligation under section 33 of the Industrial Disputes Act, 1947, not to take proceedings against the suspended workmen.

96. The Government states that disciplinary action is taken against employees who occupy quarters in an unauthorised manner, without discrimination because of their union affiliation. The 15 members of the complaining union mentioned were suspended for this reason, eight of them being allowed to resume work when they vacated the premises. While agreeing that an industrial dispute had been raised in this connection, the Government denies that these measures were taken during the period of conciliation proceedings, which terminated after discussions held on 29 June and 19 July 1964.

97. It is agreed by both parties that a dispute was raised under the Industrial Disputes Act, 1947, over the case of the suspended workmen. The allegation made, however, is that during the proceedings, lasting apparently from 18 June to 19 July 1964, further departmental proceedings were taken against the suspended workmen, including the stopping or reduction of their subsistence allowance, contrary to the provisions of the Act. As the Government has not commented on this particular aspect of the matter, the Committee requests the Government to furnish its observations thereon.

Allegations relating to Disciplinary Measures in General against Workers

98. The complainants allege that the Port Authority and the Government have no right to take any disciplinary measures at all against employees of Calcutta Port because rules governing service conditions have not been issued, although the issue of such rules was the condition on which the Port Authority was granted exemption from the application of the Industrial Employment (Standing Orders) Act, 1946.

99. The Government states that rules regulating terms and conditions of service have been framed under section 31 of the Calcutta Port Act, 1890, and that the Fundamental and Supplementary Rules governing the conditions of service of central government servants have also been made applicable to the port employees. There are also the Disciplinary and Appeal Rules, 1964.

100. These general allegations are not directly linked by the complainants with any specific allegation of infringements of trade union rights and the Committee, therefore, recommends the Governing Body to decide that they do not call for further examination.

Alleged Acts of Anti-Union Discrimination in respect of Grading and Promotion to the Detriment of the Members of the Complaining Organisation

101. The complainants allege that various officers and members of their union have been discriminated against, because of their union affiliation, by being refused or deprived of promotion or being illegally deprived of acquired seniority rights to the advantage of junior or less skilled employees. In this connection, the complainants refer to the cases of Mr. A. K. Mukherjee, Mr. N. Das and Mr. Chakraborty, respectively general secretary, assistant secretary and organising secretary of the union and Messrs. D. Singh, S. K. Sarkar, S. J. N. Roy, S. Chatterjee and S. Ghosh, all active members of the union, and also to the case of the greasers employed in the Hydraulic Power Station.

102. The complainants allege also that unfair labour practices happen daily in Calcutta Port. It is not possible for each workman to go to the courts, state the complainants, because litigation is expensive and takes too long, a few years elapsing before a decision is reached, and because the authorities are vindictive towards workers who take such action.

103. The complainants also criticise the procedure for settling disputes under the Industrial Disputes Act, 1947. In the cases of Messrs. Roy, Chatterjee and Ghosh the union formally raised an industrial dispute but, it is alleged, the Regional Labour Commissioner had failed to give a ruling after about three years, while the Minister of Labour has refused to refer the cases of Messrs. Chakraborty and Mukherjee to a tribunal for adjudication.

104. The Government states that most of these cases have been handled without success by the Conciliation Officer and that in each case the action taken by the employers was found to be " in accordance with seniority rules " or employment rules, and that referral to a tribunal for adjudication was refused for this reason or because the allegations of victimisation made were " found to be without substance ".

105. It further appears that where employees of a Government concern raise a dispute which is not settled by a conciliation officer it does not go forward for settlement by adjudication unless the competent authority gives permission. This happened certainly in the cases of Mr. Chakraborty and Mr. Mukherjee, and, perhaps, in the case of the greasers of the Hydraulic Power Station. In the cases of Messrs. Roy, Chatterjee and Ghosh the position is not clear because the complainants say that the Labour Commissioner has failed to give a ruling after three years, while the Government states that the action taken was in accordance with seniority rules.

106. In view of the fact that the complainants allege that court procedure is too lengthy and expensive for workers to have recourse to it—a point on which the Government has made no comment—the Committee requests the Government to be good enough to explain what remedy is open to the worker whose case is not settled by conciliation and according to what rules and by whom the decision is taken as to whether his case may be adjudicated and to state how these rules were applied in the particular cases referred to in paragraph 101 above.

Allegations relating to Discriminatory Treatment with regard to the Granting of Loans

107. According to long-standing practice, state the complainants, Class IV workers have been entitled to obtain temporary loans from the Inferior Staff Loan Fund and Class III workers loans from the Port Commissioners' Co-operative Credit Society. But, it is alleged, several Class IV workers who have been reclassified as Class III and most of whom belong to the complaining organisation have been refused loans from the Credit Society and so cannot have loans from either fund.

108. The Government states that loans from the Port Commissioners' Fund are available only to Class IV employees and not, therefore, to Class IV employees who have been promoted to Class III. The Co-operative Credit Society advances loans to workers in the first three classes. Through shortage of funds it has been unable to enrol new members. The Commissioners are therefore amending the Loan Fund rules to allow the new Class III employees to have temporary loans until the Credit Society is able to accept them as members.

109. The Committee does not consider that it has sufficient evidence before it to show that any anti-union discrimination has been practised in the granting of loans. That being so it is not concerned, in the absence of evidence that the question is directly related to the exercise of trade union rights, with what provision may be made for the granting of loans to employees.

110. The Committee therefore recommends the Governing Body to decide that these allegations do not call for further examination.

Allegations relating to Casual Labour

111. The complainants state in their communication dated 21 October 1964 that the Port Commissioners employ many workers through a casual labour contractor and that these workers, who have worked as much as ten years side by side with the port workers, get no benefit of provident funds, bonus, sick leave, annual leave with pay, etc. and are employed all this time as casual workers generally at lower pay even though in fact their employment is permanent.

112. In their communication dated 26 December 1964, the complainants allege that the employer has begun to engage casual labourers directly for the Chief Mechanical Engineer's Department, instead of through a contractor, in order to avoid having to employ those who have been casually employed for a long time and have presented grievances through the complaining union. According to the complainants this has resulted in a lowering of the wages paid to casual workers even though the employers no longer have to pay commission to a contractor.

113. The union raised a formal dispute on this matter before the Regional Labour Commissioner and, at a tripartite meeting on 3 December 1964, the Port Authority, it is alleged, agreed to request the employment exchange to give preference in regard to engagement to casual workers who had previously been engaged through the contractor. This undertaking not being honoured, state the complainants, the matter was referred to the Conciliation Officer, who wrote formally to the Port Commissioners' Chief Labour Officer asking him to make the necessary representation to the Labour Exchange (a purported copy of this letter, dated 23 December 1964, is furnished by the complainants). But, it is alleged, no action was taken, and new casual workers continue to be engaged at lower rates and in inferior conditions and without medical benefits. In the view of the complainants this is being done in order to discredit and weaken the union.

114. The Government states that the majority of the port workers are now decasualised. Recently one contractor failed to supply casual workers because of difficulties created, according to the Government, by the complaining organisation. The Commissioners, therefore, have had to recruit casual workers from the Labour Exchange.

115. The Government declares that a formal request was made to the Labour Exchange to consider the recruitment and placement, against requisitions by the Chief Mechanical Engineer, of men formerly employed by labour contractors as casual labour in the Chief Mechanical Engineer's Department. This arrangement is now working and they are being paid the general rate for this class of casual labour in other departments. The Medical Attendance Rules and Provident Fund Rules are not applicable to any casual workers so that, says the Government, it is baseless to claim that their non-application to casual workers in the Chief Mechanical Engineer's Department is a discrimination against them because they belong to the complaining organisation.

116. As the position with regard to casual labour appears to have been regularised it would not appear that any useful purpose would be served by pursuing further the allegation that, prior to these arrangements, they were discriminated against as members of the complaining organisation, an allegation which, in any event, was in somewhat general terms.

117. In these circumstances the Committee recommends the Governing Body to decide that these allegations do not call for further examination.

Allegations relating to Inhumane Treatment of Workers

118. A number of cases of alleged inhumane treatment for workers who have suffered severe injury or incapacity in the course of their employment are cited by the complainants in their communication dated 26 December 1964.

119. The Government explained the measures that have been taken to provide artificial limbs, to pay statutory compensation and, where appropriate, to offer alternative work to the persons concerned.

120. None of these cases appears to raise any issues directly related to the exercise of trade union rights.

121. In these circumstances the Committee recommends the Governing Body to decide that these allegations do not call for further examination.

Allegations relating to the Right to Strike

122. The complainants allege that the right to strike has been recognised as a " fundamental right " by the Government, but that the Government takes drastic action to break any strike and allows the police to interfere illegally with the trade union rights of the workers.

123. The Government states that the right to strike is a fundamental right under the Constitution. It is exercised subject to the conditions laid down in sections 10 (3), 22 and 23 of the Industrial Disputes Act, 1947. Contraventions are subject to the penal provisions of the Act but this course is rarely pursued.

124. The Committee has always applied the principle that allegations relating to the right to strike are not outside its competence in so far as they affect the exercise of trade union rights.[1] In the present case, however, the allegations are in such general terms that the Committee considers them to be too vague to permit of their being examined on their merits.

125. With regard to the case as a whole the Committee recommends the Governing Body—

(a) to decide, for the reasons indicated in paragraphs 87 to 94, 98 to 100 and 107 to 124 above, that the allegations relating to workers' housing rights, to an infringement of the Industrial Disputes Act, 1947, to disciplinary measures in general against workers, to discriminatory treatment with regard to the granting of loans, to casual labour, to inhumane treatment of workers and to the right to strike do not call for further examination;

(b) to take note of the present interim report with regard to the remaining allegations, it being understood that the Committee will report further thereon when it has received additional information and observations which it has decided to request the Government to be good enough to furnish.

Case No. 451 :

Complaint Presented by the Latin American Confederation of Christian Trade Unionists against the Government of Bolivia

126. The complaint by the Latin American Confederation of Christian Trade Unionists (C.L.A.S.C.) was submitted in a direct letter to the I.L.O. dated 26 July 1965. It was forwarded to the Government, which sent in its observations on 1 September 1965.

127. Bolivia has ratified the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), but not the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98).

128. The Confederation's letter dated 26 July 1965 was accompanied by copies of four presidential decrees: No. 07171 dated 17 May 1965, No. 07172 dated 18 May 1965 and Nos. 07204 and 07205 dated 3 June 1965.

129. The complainants allege that these decrees constitute a flagrant breach of the principles of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), which has been ratified by Bolivia, in that they place the trade union movement under the control of the Military Government Junta and create a unified trade union movement at all levels from the individual union up to the central national organisation. The complainants likewise allege that the four decrees in practice amount to a new General Labour Act since they lay down new standards affecting even the smallest details of trade union organisation. The complainants add that all elections held before 17 May 1965 (when the first of these four decrees was issued) have been declared null and void and that accordingly since that date all trade union leaders have been disqualified from office. Furthermore, the decrees are alleged to specify 26 July 1965 as the date on which all unions must hold further elections to appoint new officials; these elections must be held in the presence of an official of the Ministry of Labour who must make a record of the proceedings. Before an election, the names of the candidates must be notified to the Ministry of Labour, which is empowered to eliminate those regarded as " politically contaminated ". After the election, the Ministry must be informed of the names of the winners and has power to disallow such elections as it thinks fit. According to the complainants, the decrees lay stress on the fact that the union leaders may not be members of political parties or maintain contact with them, and state that no person may be re-elected after he has held trade union office for one year. The complainants take the view that this requirement is disastrous for a trade union movement in an underdeveloped country which cannot find the men to replace all the officials in each union, federation and confederation. Lastly, the complainants state that the conditions laid down in the decrees for the dissolution of a trade union are open to abuse since they allow dissolution to be ordered on such grounds as sabotage, which would allow the Junta a very wide margin of discretion and give it another powerful weapon for interference in trade union affairs.

130. The Government in its reply dated 1 September 1965 states that the Military Junta has had to take over because demagogic policies combined with the dominance of the Government party were threatening to bring the country to anarchy and the unions were exercising an iron grip on the working masses whom they no longer genuinely represented. The Government adds that the unions had modern means of propaganda such as powerful, highly mobile radio systems through which they incited the working classes to rebel against the new Government, and that the union leaders were encouraging the population to make use of the arms which had been distributed to the workers for the purpose of securing political domination. The Government states that it had had no alternative but to issue the decrees in question in order to remove corrupt union leaders and clean up the union movement. This entailed filling the senior offices in the union movement with new men. The Government adds that it behaved perfectly fairly and those leaders who wished were at liberty to leave the country. Referring to the decrees, the Government states that they are interim measures designed to pacify the country and rebuild its institutions, of which the trade unions are among the most important, but only on condition that they actually represent the will of the majority of their members and not that of closed groups who operate for political purposes and contrary to the legitimate interests of the working class. The Government concludes by stating that the decrees have been—and will be—applied only in cases where there is no alternative and that in any event the courts, staffed by impartial judges, are open to persons who consider themselves injured if they can substantiate their complaints; the courts provide every safeguard and there is nothing to be feared by those who have recourse to them—as many in fact have done.

131. The Committee observes that of the four decrees in question, three—Decrees Nos. 07171 dated 17 May 1965, 07172 dated 18 May 1965 (issuing regulations for the application of the previous decree) and 07205 dated 3 June 1965 (supplementing the two previous decrees)—deal mainly with the reorganisation of the trade unions and the elections to be held for this purpose. The fourth decree—No. 07204 dated 3 June 1965—is more general in character and supplements Title IX of the Presidential Decree of 23 August 1943 issued in pursuance of the General Labour Act. Accordingly, the allegations concerning interference with the right of the unions to elect their representatives will be dealt with separately from the allegations dealing with the other provisions of Decree No. 07204.

Allegations regarding Interference with the Right of Trade Unions to Elect Their Representatives

132. The complainants allege that, after declaring all trade union elections before 17 May to be null and void, the Government issued four decrees (Nos. 07171, 07172, 07204 and 07205), laying down a whole series of conditions governing the holding of elections and the submission of candidatures, which were at variance with the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87).

133. The Government admits the existence of these decrees, which, it states, had to be issued because there was no alternative method of eliminating corrupt trade union leaders and cleaning up the trade union movement, since the former leaders maintained an iron grip on the working masses whom they no longer genuinely represented. The Government also declares that the decrees have always been regarded as interim measures and have not been and will not be employed except in cases where there is no alternative.

(a) Allegations concerning Interference by the Authorities in Trade Union Elections.

134. Decree No. 07171 states (section 2) that all trade unions in Bolivia must renew their leadership on the basis of democratic elections within 40 days of the date on which the unions at the departmental and national levels were due to be reorganised. A similar clause is embodied in section 4 of Decree No. 07172. Section 5 of Decree No. 07205 fixes 26 June 1965 as the date for the elections and section 10 of the same decree stipulates that in order to be valid the elections must be supervised by a representative of the Ministry of Labour and Social Security or by the civil or military authorities of the district. Section 6 of Decree No. 07172 stipulates that the Ministry of Labour and Social Security shall recognise only trade union officials who have been elected in accordance with these requirements. Section 7 of Decree No. 07205 states that workers seeking trade union office must make application, together with full personal particulars, to the Ministry of Labour ten days before the date on which the elections are due to be held; unless this is done, the elections will not be valid. Section 8 states that, in order to allow the democratic process to operate freely in each union, there must be at least two candidates. Finally, section 11 of Decree No. 07205 requires the Ministry of Labour and Social Security, after verifying each case so as to ensure that all the conditions laid down in Presidential Decrees Nos. 07171, 07172 and 07205 have been complied with, to issue a ministerial decision approving the composition of the executive in each union, failing which the elections will not be legal and will be held to be null and void.

135. The Committee has emphasised on several occasions the importance which it has always attached to the principle that workers' organisations should have the right to elect their representatives in full freedom. This is one of the vital aspects of freedom of association and means that governments should refrain from any interference which may curtail this right or impede its lawful exercise.[1] The Committee notes that the decrees in question contain a number of clauses which involve interference by the public authorities in various stages of the electoral process, beginning with the obligation to submit the candidates' names beforehand to the Ministry of Labour, together with personal particulars, continuing with the presence of a representative of the Ministry of Labour or the civil or military authorities at the elections, and culminating with the approval of the elections by ministerial decision, without which they are invalid. In an earlier case[2] the Committee has observed that there exist in a number of countries legal provisions whereby an official who is independent of the public authorities—such as a trade union registrar—may take action, subject to an appeal to the courts, if complaint is made or there are reasonable grounds for supposing that irregularities have taken place in a trade union election contrary to law or to the rules of the organisation concerned; again, irregularities of this kind may give rise to action in the ordinary courts. But the Committee considered in this case that this was quite a different situation from that which arises when the elections are stated in general terms to be valid only after being approved by the administrative authorities, and it noted that the I.L.O. Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations had observed that such provisions were not compatible with the principle embodied in Article 3, paragraph 2, of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), to the effect that the public authorities should refrain from any interference which would restrict or impede the lawful exercise by organisations of their right to elect their representatives in full freedom.[3]

136. Accordingly, while the Committee takes note of the Government's statement that the decrees in question are interim measures which have not been and will not be applied except in cases where there is no alternative, it considers that they are not compatible with the foregoing principle of the right to hold free elections.

137. In these circumstances the Committee recommends the Governing Body to call the Government's attention to the fact that the provisions of Decrees Nos. 07171, 07172 and 07205 relating to intervention by the public authorities at the different stages of the procedure of electing trade union leaders are incompatible with the guarantees to which trade unions are entitled under the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), which has been ratified by Bolivia, and suggests therefore that the Government should consider amending them so that the trade unions can elect their representatives freely, and that the public authorities should refrain from any interference which would restrict this right or impede the lawful exercise thereof.

(b) Allegations relating to Persons Eligible for Election to Trade Union Office.

138. Section 3 of Decree No. 07171 lays down that to be a member of the executive of any workers' organisation it shall be an essential requirement that the candidate shall be a worker actively employed by the undertaking or employing body in question, to which section 3 of Decree No. 07172 adds that a trade union official shall forfeit his right to office automatically on ceasing to be an employee of the undertaking or employing body concerned, on assuming an active political function or on entering a branch of employment different from and removed from that of the undertaking where he has been employed. Section 7 of Decree No. 07204 stipulates, among other conditions with which members of trade union executives must comply, that they must never have been sentenced to corporal punishment by a court of law, and that they must have been in the regular employment of the undertaking for not less than a year. Section 8 of the same decree lays down that the term of office of a trade union official shall be for one year, and he may not be re-elected to office in the same trade union or in a workers' organisation of a higher degree until a certain period has elapsed.

139. In a number of earlier cases the Committee has had to consider whether the making of election to trade union office subject to conditions is consistent with the right of workers to elect their representatives in full freedom.

140. As regards the provisions stipulating that candidates must be actively employed by the undertaking or employing body concerned and that if they leave that undertaking they forfeit their right to trade union office, the Committee took the view in an earlier case that the fact that a member of a union executive who was dismissed would lose not only his employment but also his right to participate in the administration of his trade union meant that the management could in this way " interfere with the right of the workers to elect their representatives in full freedom, a right which constitutes one of the essential aspects of freedom of association ".[1] The Committee also recalls the statement by the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations that, when provisions in national legislation provide that all the trade union leaders shall belong to the occupation in respect of which the organisation carries on its activities, the guarantees laid down in the Convention may be impaired. In fact, in such cases, the dismissal of a worker who is a trade union leader may, by reason of the fact that dismissal causes him to lose his status as a trade union officer, infringe the freedom of activity of the organisation and its right to elect representatives in freedom, and may even leave the way open for acts of interference by the employer.[2]

141. As concerns the ban on the holding of trade union office by anyone who has been sentenced for an offence, the Committee observed in another case where the grounds incompatible with, or disqualifying from, the holding of office included sentence " by any court whatsoever, except for political offences, to a term of imprisonment of one month or more " that this general provision could be interpreted in such a way as to exclude from responsible trade union posts any individuals convicted for activities connected with the exercise of trade union rights, such as violation of the laws governing the press, and thus to curtail unduly the right of trade union members to elect their representatives freely.[3]

142. The Committee considers that in the present case the scope of the ban is so wide that it could also extend to those convicted of offences the nature of which was not such as to be prejudicial to the proper exercise of official trade union functions.

[3] See Sixth Report, Case No. 40 (France-Tunisia), para. 513.

143. With respect to the ban on the re-election of trade union officials the Committee recalls the opinion expressed by the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations that such a provision is not compatible with Article 3, paragraph 1, of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), under which workers' organisations should have the right " to elect their representatives in full freedom ". The Committee fully shares this opinion and considers, moreover, that such a ban could have serious repercussions on the normal development of a trade union movement lacking in persons capable of adequately carrying out the functions of trade union office.

144. The Committee therefore considers that the aforementioned conditions attached by Decrees Nos. 07171, 07172 and 07204 to election to trade union office are not consistent with the right which should be enjoyed by all workers to elect their representatives in full freedom.

145. In these circumstances the Committee recommends the Governing Body to draw the Government's attention to the fact that the provisions of Decrees Nos. 07171, 07172 and 07204 preventing the re-election of trade union officials and attaching other conditions to their election (being actively employed by the undertaking concerned, and not having been sentenced for an offence) are inconsistent with the right guaranteed by the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), to all workers to elect their representatives in full freedom, and to suggest in consequence that the Government examine the possibility of amending these provisions so as to enable workers' organisations to elect their representatives in full freedom.

Allegations relating to Decree No. 07204 of 3 June 1965

(a) Allegations relating to the Number of Organisations That May Be Formed.

146. The complainants allege that Decree No. 07204 has established a single trade union system, obligatory at all levels, from the individual union through the intermediate levels to the single national confederation.

147. Section 4 of Decree No. 07204 lays down that only one trade union may be formed in each undertaking or firm, to be known as the " employees' union ", and to embrace all the employees of the undertaking in question, irrespective of their occupation, functions, skills or activities. Section 33 states that unions of employees of undertakings with work centres in various departments of the Republic may form national federations. Mixed unions may also form a national federation.

148. As the Committee has pointed out on a number of occasions [1], Article 2 of Convention No. 87 provides that workers and employers shall have the right to establish and to join organisations " of their own choosing ". This provision of the Convention is in no way intended as an expression of support either for the idea of trade union unity or for that of trade union diversity. It is intended to convey on the one hand that in many countries there are several organisations among which the workers or the employers may wish to choose freely, and, on the other hand, that workers and employers may wish to establish new organisations in a country where no such diversity has hitherto been found. In other words, although the Convention is evidently not intended to make trade union diversity an obligation, it does at least require this diversity to remain possible in all cases. Accordingly, any governmental attitude involving the " imposition " of a single trade union organisation would be contrary to Article 2 of Convention No. 87.

149. In these circumstances the Committee recommends the Governing Body to draw the Government's attention to the importance it has always attached to the principle that workers and employers should have the right to establish and to join organisations " of their own choosing ", as laid down by Article 2 of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), which has been ratified by Bolivia, and to suggest in consequence to the Government that it consider amending Decree No. 07204 to bring it into line with the aforementioned principle.

(b) Allegations relating to the Dissolution of Trade Unions.

150. The complainants allege that one of the grounds on which trade unions may be dissolved under the terms of Decree No. 07204 is sabotage, which in their opinion is open to a wide variety of interpretations and places in the hands of the Junta yet another powerful means of intervention in trade union affairs.

151. The Government has made no comment on this point in its reply.

152. Section 21 of Decree No. 07204 lays down that—

> Section 129 of the Decree issuing regulations for the administration of the General Labour Act shall read:
>
> " Trade unions may be dissolved only by a final judgment with executory force given by a labour court at the conclusion of summary proceedings, on one of the following grounds:
> . . . . . .
> (d) proved sabotage."

153. Before proceeding with its examination of this aspect of the case the Committee would be glad if the Government would be good enough to inform it as to what are the exact provisions in force in the country as regards penal sanctions for sabotage, and it decides therefore to postpone examination of this aspect of the case pending receipt of the information in question.

154. In all the circumstances, and having regard to the case as a whole, the Committee recommmends the Governing Body—

(a) to draw the Government's attention to the fact that the provisions of Decrees Nos. 07171, 07172 and 07205 referring to intervention by the public authorities at the different stages of the procedure of electing trade union officials are incompatible with the guarantees to which trade unions are entitled under the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), which has been ratified by Bolivia, and to suggest therefore that the Government should consider amending them so as to enable workers' organisations to elect their representatives freely, the public authorities being obliged to refrain from any interference which would restrict this right or impede the lawful exercise thereof;

(b) to draw the Government's attention to the fact that the provisions of Decrees Nos. 07171, 07172 and 07204 preventing the re-election of trade union officials and attaching other conditions to their election (being actively employed by the undertaking concerned, and not having been sentenced for an offence) are inconsistent with the right guaranteed by the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), to all workers to elect their representatives in full freedom, and to suggest in consequence that the Government examine the possibility of amending these provisions so as to enable workers' organisations to elect their representatives in full freedom;

(c) to draw the Government's attention to the importance it has always attached to the principle that workers and employers should have the right to establish and to join organisations " of their own choosing ", as laid down by Article 2 of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), which has been ratified by Bolivia, and to suggest in consequence to the Government that it consider amending Decree No. 07204 to bring it into line with the aforementioned drinciple;

(d) to draw the Government's attention to the fact that the provision of Decree No. 07204 preventing the forming of proper trade unions in recently established undertakings is not in keeping with the principle laid down by Article 2 of Convention No. 87 that all workers should have the right to establish organisations of their own choosing, and to suggest that its amendment be considered so as to enable all workers to establish their own organisations in accordance with the aforementioned principle;

(e) to request the Government to inform the Committee as to what are the exact provisions in force in the country as regards penal sanctions for sabotage, and to decide in the meantime to postpone examination of this aspect of the case;

(f) to bring the foregoing conclusions to the attention of the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations.

Geneva, 11 November 1965.

(Signed) Roberto AGO,
Chairman.

Eighty-seventh Report [1]

Introduction

1. The Committee on Freedom of Association set up by the Governing Body at its 117th Session (November 1951) met at the International Labour Office, Geneva, on 14 February 1966, under the chairmanship of Mr. Roberto Ago, former Chairman of the Governing Body. The member of the Committee of Brazilian nationality was not present during its examination of the case relating to Brazil (Case No. 385).

2. In accordance with the procedure laid down in paragraph 12 of its 29th Report, as amended by paragraph 5 of its 43rd Report, the Committee recommends the Governing Body to examine the present report at its 164th Session.[2]

3. The Committee considered—(a) 46 cases in which the complaints had been communicated to the governments concerned for their observations, namely the cases relating to Sudan (Case No. 191), Singapore (Case No. 194), Thailand (Case No. 202), United Kingdom (Southern Rhodesia) (Cases Nos. 251 and 414), Portugal (Case No. 266), Libya (Case No. 274), Belgium (Case No. 281), Cuba (Cases Nos. 283, 329 and 425), United Kingdom (Aden) (Case No. 291), United Kingdom (Case No. 292), Spain (Cases Nos. 294, 383, 397 and 400), Ghana (Case No. 303), Greece (Case No. 309), Peru (Case No. 335), Panama (Case No. 349), Dominican Republic (Case No. 350), Greece (Case No. 353), Mexico (Case No. 358), Dominican Republic (Case No. 360), Colombia (Case No. 363), Congo (Leopoldville) (Case No. 365), Federal Republic of Germany (Case No. 371), Haiti (Case No. 373), Honduras (Case No. 381), Brazil (Case No. 385), Guatemala (Case No. 396), Argentina (Case No. 399), Upper Volta (Case No. 403), Honduras (Case No. 408), Cameroon (Case No. 418), Congo (Brazzaville) (Case No. 419), United Kingdom (Aden) (Case No. 421), Ecuador (Case No. 422), Honduras (Case No. 423), Congo (Leopoldville) (Case No. 427), Portugal (Case No. 432), Ecuador (Case No. 433), Guatemala (Case No. 442), Greece (Case No. 453) and Bolivia (Case No. 456); and (b) three complaints relating to Burundi (Case No. 401), one complaint relating to Cuba (Case No. 458) and 28 complaints relating to Venezuela (Case No. 462), which were submitted to the Committee for opinion prior to being communicated to the governments concerned.

Cases the Examination of Which the Committee Has Adjourned

(a) Case Which the Committee Considers to Be Urgent.

4. The Committee adjourned until its next session its examination of the case relating to the Congo (Brazzaville) (Case No. 419), in which it is still awaiting further information previously requested from the government concerned. The Committee requests the government concerned to furnish the information in question as a matter of urgency.

(b) Other Cases.

5. The Committee adjourned until its next session the cases relating to Portugal (Case No. 266), Libya (Case No. 274), Greece (Case No. 309), Panama (Case No. 349), Dominican Republic (Case No. 350), Greece (Case No. 353), Mexico (Case No. 358), Argentina (Case No. 399), Upper Volta (Case No. 403), Ecuador (Cases Nos. 422 and 433) and Guatemala (Case No. 442), in which it is still awaiting further information previously requested from the governments concerned, the case relating to the United Kingdom (Aden) (Case No. 291), in which further information previously requested from the government concerned was received too late to permit of its being examined at the present session, and the cases relating to Spain (Cases Nos. 294, 383, 397 and 400), in which part of the further information previously requested from the government concerned has been received. With regard to the case relating to Greece (Case No. 353) the Committee took note of a communication from the government concerned stating that the information in question was not yet available; with regard to the case relating to Argentina (Case No. 399) the Committee took note of a communication from the government concerned stating that the information in question could not be furnished by the date requested; with regard to the case relating to Guatemala (Case No. 442) the Committee took note of a communication from the government concerned stating that the request for further information had been referred to the competent authorities.

6. The Committee adjourned until its next session the case relating to Bolivia (Case No. 456), in which it has not yet received the observations of the government concerned.

7. The Committee also adjourned until its next session the cases relating to Singapore (Case No. 194), Belgium (Case No. 281), Peru (Case No. 335), Honduras (Cases Nos. 381 and 423) and Portugal (Case No. 432).

Cases in Which the Committee Submits Its Conclusions to the Governing Body

8. In the present report the Committee submits for the approval of the Governing Body the conclusions which it has now reached concerning the remaining cases before it, namely the cases relating to Sudan (Case No. 191), Thailand (Case No. 202), United Kingdom (Southern Rhodesia) (Cases Nos. 251 and 414), Cuba (Cases Nos. 283, 329 and 425), United Kingdom (Case No. 292), Ghana (Case No. 303), Dominican Republic (Case No. 360), Colombia (Case No. 363), Congo (Leopoldville) (Case No. 365), Federal Republic of Germany (Case No. 371), Haiti (Case No. 373), Brazil (Case No. 385), Guatemala (Case No. 396), Honduras (Case No. 408), Cameroon (Case No. 418), United Kingdom (Aden) (Case No. 421), Congo (Leopoldville) (Case No. 427) and Greece (Case No. 453), and the complaints relating to Burundi (Case No. 401), Cuba (Case No. 458) and Venezuela (Case No. 462), which were submitted to the Committee for opinion. These conclusions may be briefly summarised as follows:

(a) the Committee recommends that the complaints relating to Burundi (Case No. 401) and Venezuela (Case No. 462), which were submitted to it for opinion, should, for the reasons indicated in paragraphs 9 to 13 of this report, be dismissed as irreceivable under the procedure in force, without being communicated to the governments concerned;

(b) the Committee recommends that the complaint relating to Cuba (Case No. 458), which was submitted to it for opinion, should, for the reasons indicated in paragraphs 14 to 17 of this report, be dismissed without being communicated to the government concerned;

(c) the Committee recommends that, for the reasons indicated in paragraphs 18 to 34 of this report, the cases relating to the Federal Republic of Germany (Case No. 371) and Congo (Leopoldville) (Case No. 427) should be dismissed as not calling for further examination;

(d) with regard to the cases relating to Sudan (Case No. 191), United Kingdom (Southern Rhodesia) (Cases Nos. 251 and 414) and Colombia (Case No. 363), the Committee, for the reasons indicated in paragraphs 35 to 91 of this report, has reached certain conclusions to which it wishes to draw the attention of the Governing Body;

(e) with regard to the cases relating to Thailand (Case No. 202), Cuba (Cases Nos. 283, 329 and 425), United Kingdom (Case No. 292), Ghana (Case No. 303), Dominican Republic (Case No. 360), Congo (Leopoldville) (Case No. 365), Haiti (Case No. 373), Brazil (Case No. 385), Guatemala (Case No. 396), Honduras (Case No. 408), Cameroon (Case No. 418), United Kingdom (Aden) (Case No. 421) and Greece (Case No. 453), the Committee, for the reasons indicated in paragraphs 92 to 293 of this report, has presented an interim report stating certain conclusions to which it wishes to draw the attention of the Governing Body.

COMPLAINTS WHICH THE COMMITTEE RECOMMENDS SHOULD BE DISMISSED AS IRRECEIVABLE UNDER THE PROCEDURE IN FORCE

9. The Director-General has received, either directly or through the United Nations, a number of complaints which are not receivable under the provisions of the existing procedure.

10. The complaints in question are irreceivable for one or other of two reasons: (a) one because it emanates from an international organisation of workers not having consultative status with the I.L.O. and not having affiliates in the country concerned [1]; (b) 30 because they emanate from national organisations of workers other than those to which the complaints relate, having no direct interest in the matters raised in the allegations.[2]

11. So far as the first category is concerned, the Director-General has received through the United Nations a communication dated 18 November 1965, emanating from the International Federation of Christian Agricultural Workers' Unions and containing allegations of infringements of trade union rights in Burundi (Case No. 401).

12. With regard to complaints falling within the second category the Director-General has received—

(a) two communications containing allegations of infringements of trade union rights in Burundi (Case No. 401) forwarded by the French Democratic Confederation of Labour on 8 November 1965, and by the Dominica Technical, Clerical and Commercial Workers' Union on 12 November 1965;

(b) 28 communications containing allegations of infringements of trade union rights in Venezuela (Case No. 462) forwarded during November 1965 and January 1966 by various locals or branches of the Workers' Centre of Revolutionary Cuba.

13. The Committee recommends the Governing Body to decide that, for the reasons indicated in paragraph 10 above, the complaints referred to in paragraphs 11 and 12 above are not receivable under the procedure in force.

COMPLAINT WHICH THE COMMITTEE RECOMMENDS SHOULD BE DISMISSED WITHOUT BEING COMMUNICATED TO THE GOVERNMENT CONCERNED

Case No. 458:

Complaint Presented by the Industrial Chemistry Federation of Cuba (in Exile) against the Government of Cuba

14. In a communication sent from Miami (United States) on 13 October 1965, the Industrial Chemistry Federation of Cuba (in exile) declares that the workers José Luis Prado and Luis Sánchez Fernández are serving long sentences in the Isla de Pinos prison, and that their state of health is seriously undermined because they are compelled to perform forced labour and lack medical care. The complainants ask the I.L.O. to intercede with the Cuban Government to end the forced labour of the persons concerned.

15. Before transmitting the complaint to the Cuban Government the Director-General wrote to the complaining organisation, on 25 October 1965, informing it that any further information it might wish to submit in substantiation of its complaint should be forwarded to him within one month. No communication containing additional information has so far been received from the Industrial Chemistry Federation of Cuba (in exile).

[1] See 29th Report, para. 9.

[2] Ibid.

16. In accordance with the procedure in force [1], the Director-General decided to submit the complaint to the Committee for its opinion as to whether it was sufficiently substantiated to justify him in communicating it to the government concerned.

17. As the complainants have not availed themselves of the opportunity offered to them to furnish further information in substantiation of their complaint, from the text of which it is not possible to deduce the reasons for which the persons named were sentenced and, in consequence, the relation—if any—between the sentences and trade union activities, so that it is impossible to judge the case on its merits, the Committee recommends the Governing Body to decide that the complaint should be dismissed without being communicated to the government concerned.

Cases Which the Committee Considers Do Not Call for Further Examination

Case No. 371:

Complaint Presented by the World Federation of Trade Unions against the Government of the Federal Republic of Germany

18. The Committee has already submitted interim reports on this case to the Governing Body in paragraphs 242 to 252 of its 74th Report, paragraphs 197 to 203 of its 78th Report and paragraphs 254 to 261 of its 83rd Report.

19. It was alleged in this case that Messrs. Franz Moritz and Horst Benz, delegates from the Sixth Congress of the Confederation of Free German Trade Unions (F.D.G.B.), held in East Berlin, had wished to transmit a fraternal message to the Extraordinary Congress of the Confederation of Trade Unions of the Federal Republic of Germany (D.G.B.) held in Düsseldorf in 1963, but were arrested and subsequently sentenced for breach of the legislation which prohibits the Communist Party in the Federal Republic of Germany and for introducing and attempting to distribute documents endangering the security of the State. Both the persons in question had been released after serving part of their sentences.

20. At its meeting in May 1965 the Committee, recalling previous requests which had already been made to the Government in this connection, recommended the Governing Body, in paragraph 261 of its 83rd Report, once again to request the Government to furnish the text of the document which gave rise to the penal proceedings, together with the judgments and the grounds adduced therein (that is to say, the judgment of the court which imposed the sentences and the judgment of the Federal Court rejecting an appeal lodged by Mr. Moritz).

21. The 83rd Report of the Committee was approved by the Governing Body at its 162nd Session (May-June 1965) and the above request for information was brought to the notice of the Government by a letter dated 3 June 1965. On 10 January 1966 the Government forwarded the texts of the judgment given by the Düsseldorf Provincial Court on 17 December 1963—in which is incorporated the text of the document which gave rise to the proceedings—and of the judgment given by the Federal Court on 15 April 1964 dismissing the appeal of Mr. Franz Moritz.

22. The document in question is a kind of manifesto containing statements of the aims of the trade union movements in the Federal Republic of Germany and Eastern Germany and criticisms of Western political and military policy. Part of the document extols the merits of the socialist state and the usefulness of the work of the trade unions in such a society; it then proceeds to more purely political issues. It refers to " militarists, Fascists and anti-Semites who used to serve Hitler and now have influential posts in the administration and economy of the Federal Republic ", counsels the West German trade unions to " rely on the strength which is offered to you by the existence of the German Democratic Republic and the whole socialist camp " and expresses regret that they " are not in power, as we are in the German Democratic Republic ". The document then denounces the alleged desire of the Federal Republic for atomic armament and continues: " In the long run . . . there will be no more capitalism, no more class war, no more working class in West Germany . . . the lesson taught by Karl Marx is still valid for West German trade unions today: the unions, as a rallying point for resistance against capitalist violence, must not only fight the practical effects of the capitalist system but must also use their organised strength as a lever for the final liberation of the working class." The document expresses the ideas of the East German trade unions for bringing about German national unity under the leadership of the working class, but criticises the leaders of D.G.B. for being anti-communist, and calls upon those unions " to tolerate no longer the abuse of West German trade unions in the interests of anti-communist bosses and militarists ". It concludes with the expression of a desire to see a strengthening of relations between the two trade union movements in Germany.

[1] See Ninth Report, para. 23 (d).

23. The Düsseldorf Provincial Court sentenced the accused for offences against the German Penal Code and the Federal Constitutional Court Act. It found that Mr. Benz sought through his activity to set up a communist dictatorship in the Federal Republic and knew that this could be done only by setting aside the principles of the Constitution regarding democratic elections and legislative processes set forth in section 88 of the Penal Code, and that he carried the document with him to promote that purpose. Both Mr. Benz and Mr. Moritz, said the court, knew that the Communist Party and any furtherance of its activity were prohibited by law and that to serve the objects of F.D.G.B. by handing over its message was to serve the Communist Party. On the basis of the evidence given by the accused, the court found that, while believing in their cause, they realised that the purpose of their journey was to seek to further the establishment of a communist political and social order in the Federal Republic, which in itself was a criminal offence, as they knew, although they believed that what they did was not wrong. The court found both the accused guilty of offences under sections 42 and 47 of the Federal Constitutional Court Act, which provide that any person who acts deliberately in a manner contrary to the decision of that court to dissolve the Communist Party shall be punished. In the view of the court the document carried by the accused openly agitated in favour of the establishment of an undemocratic system setting aside the constitutional provisions set out in section 88 of the Penal Code and so rendered them guilty of promoting anti-constitutional activities in the sense of section 93 of the Penal Code. Certain other charges were found not proven.

24. The judgment of the Federal Court adds no further elements of assistance to the Committee in formulating its conclusions.

25. The Committee is not called upon to express any view on the political implications of the views expressed by the accused and in the document they carried or on the legislative provisions which outlaw the Communist Party in the Federal Republic and create a number of offences in respect of attempting to further its aims. It would appear, however, from the document carried by the accused and from the grounds adduced in the judgment of the Düsseldorf Provincial Court, that the visit of Messrs. Benz and Moritz to the Federal Republic had political purposes falling outside the scope of normal trade union activities.

26. In these circumstances the Committee recommends the Governing Body to decide that the case is so purely political in character that it is inappropriate to pursue the matter further.

Case No. 427:

Complaint Presented by the Union of Congolese Workers against the Government of the Congo (Leopoldville)

27. The complaint of the Union of Congolese Workers is contained in a telegram dated 12 January 1965 addressed directly to the I.L.O. The complainants were informed of their right to present additional information in support of their allegations, but they did not do so. The complaint was forwarded to the Government for its observations and the latter replied by two communications dated 27 January and 7 August 1965.

28. The Congo (Leopoldville) has ratified neither the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), nor the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98).

29. The complainants allege that two trade unionists, Mr. Atumenga and Mr. Mukuakani, belonging respectively to the Union of Congolese Workers (U.T.C.) and the General Labour Federation of the Congo were arbitrarily arrested at Kikwit.

30. In a telegram dated 27 January 1965 the Government stated that it had urgently requested information on this case from the authorities in Kwilu Province and had taken steps to have the men released.

31. In a later communication dated 7 August 1965 the Government stated that the two men, who had been arrested by the local authorities at Kikwit, had been released immediately after their trial. The Government pointed out that they had been charged by the Special General Commissioner for the Province of Kwilu with making gratuitous accusations against established authority. Fifteen days after their arrest they were tried at Kikwit by a court which condemned them to pay a 1,000-franc fine for slander. The Government added that the accused had paid the fine and, regarding the matter as closed, had no intention of appealing.

32. The Committee notes in the first place that U.T.C. confines itself in its complaint to reporting the arrest of Mr. Atumenga and Mr. Mukuakani, without claiming that it was connected with their trade union activities or membership. It also notes that the complaining organisation, when given the opportunity of providing additional information in support of its allegations, did not take advantage of it.

33. The Committee also notes that, according to the Government, the causes of the proceedings against the two men seem to be unrelated to their trade union activities or membership, and they themselves, by deciding not to appeal, appear to regard the matter as closed.

34. In these circumstances, and having regard also to the fact that the persons concerned have been released, the Committee recommends the Governing Body to decide that the case does not call for further examination.

Definitive Conclusions in the Cases relating to Sudan (Case No. 191), United Kingdom (Southern Rhodesia) (Cases Nos. 251 and 414) and Colombia (Case No. 363)

Case No. 191:

Complaints Presented by the Confederation of Arab Trade Unions, the World Federation of Trade Unions and the Sudan Railway Workers' Union against the Government of the Sudan

35. The Committee has already examined this case at its meetings in May 1960 [1], February 1961 [2], February 1962 [3], February 1964 [4] and November 1965.[5]

36. Sudan has ratified the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), but has not ratified the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87).

[5] See 85th Report, paras. 247-265.

37. Paragraph 265 of the 85th Report of the Committee, which contains the recommendations made by the Committee at its meeting in November 1965 as approved by the Governing Body at its 163rd Session (November 1965), reads as follows:

In these circumstances the Committee recommends the Governing Body—

(a) to note with satisfaction that the Trade Unions (Amendment) Ordinance, 1960, which has been the subject of various allegations, was repealed on 7 April 1965;

(b) to note the Government's statements, in its communication dated 24 June 1965, that the right of organisation is now governed, as before the events of 1958 which gave rise to the complaints, by the Trade Unions Ordinance, 1948, that trade unions are now being formed and operating in freedom and that the freedom of the trade union press has been restored;

(c) to request the Government, having regard to its statement that all trade unionists now have complete freedom of movement, to confirm that all the trade unionists sentenced to imprisonment by courts martial under the military régime, including in particular those indicated in paragraph 264 above, are now at liberty.

38. In a communication dated 9 December 1965 the Government of the Sudan confirmed that all the trade unionists named in paragraph 264 of the Committee's 85th Report, who had been sentenced to imprisonment under the previous régime, have been set free and are resuming their former activities in freedom, and that, since the end of that régime in October 1964, representatives of the Trade Union Federation and other democratic organisations have participated in the government of the country, particularly in the Constituent Assembly elected in October 1965. Since the restoration of the transitional Constitution, with its guarantees of freedom of association, expression and movement, following the revolution of October 1964, the Government states, trade unions have enjoyed complete freedom to send representatives to attend international conferences and to affiliate with international federations and confederations.

39. In these circumstances the Committee recommends the Governing Body—

(a) to note with satisfaction the Government's confirmation that all the trade unionists imprisoned under the previous régime have been set free and are resuming their former activities in freedom;

(b) to note further the Government's statement that, following the restoration of the constitutional guarantee of freedom of association in the Sudan, trade unions have enjoyed complete freedom to send representatives to attend international conferences and to affiliate with international federations and confederations;

(c) to suggest to the Government that it may now care to consider the possibility of taking the necessary measures with a view to ratifying the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87).

Cases Nos. 251 and 414:

Complaints Presented by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, the International Federation of Free Teachers' Unions, the Postal, Telegraph and Telephone International, the International Federation of Industrial Organisations and General Workers' Unions and the World Federation of Trade Unions against the Government of the United Kingdom in respect of Southern Rhodesia

40. These cases comprise two series of allegations, one relating to the detention of trade unionists and the other to the provisions of the Industrial Conciliation Act, 1959. Since the last session of the Committee, on 8 and 9 November 1965, the situation has been affected by the unilateral declaration of independence by the authorities in Southern Rhodesia on 11 November 1965. In the light of the factual situation existing at the present time, the Government of the United Kingdom, referring itself more especially to the allegations relating to the detention of trade unionists, addressed a communication to the Director-General on 7 February 1966, in which, after explaining the attitude it had adopted with regard to this case, vis-à-vis the authorities in Southern Rhodesia, prior to 11 November 1965, the Government indicates that it will again take up the matter with the competent authorities when full constitutional authority has been restored in Southern Rhodesia. This communication is more fully analysed in paragraphs 64 and 65 below.

41. The Government of the United Kingdom has ratified the Right of Association (Non-Metropolitan Territories) Convention, 1947 (No. 84), and has undertaken, with the agreement of the Government of Southern Rhodesia, to apply its provisions without modification to Southern Rhodesia. The Government of the United Kingdom, which has also ratified the Right of Association (Agriculture) Convention, 1921 (No. 11), the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), and the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), has reserved its decision regarding the application of the provisions of these Conventions to Southern Rhodesia.

Allegations relating to Detentions of Trade Unionists

42. Allegations relating to detentions of trade unionists were raised in the complaint by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, submitted to the I.L.O. in a letter dated 4 September 1964. Additional information was supplied in letters dated 20 October and 4 November 1964. The International Federation of Industrial Organisations and General Workers' Unions lodged a complaint in a letter dated 29 September 1964, making the same allegations as I.C.F.T.U. All these communications were forwarded to the Government for its observations as they were received, and the Government replied by three letters dated 6 and 9 November 1964 and 15 February 1965.

43. The above communications were before the Committee at its meeting in February 1965, when the Committee, as indicated below, decided to request the Government to furnish fuller information. Since that time further documents of complaint from the World Federation of Trade Unions, dated 27 February 1965, and from I.C.F.T.U., dated 27 April 1965, have been received and transmitted to the Government, which replied by a communication dated 2 September 1965.

44. In its communication dated 4 September 1964 I.C.F.T.U. alleged that eight trade unionists had been detained, without trial, at the Wha Wha Prison, while another, Mr. Josias Maluleke, had been restricted to the Gonakudzingwa Restriction Centre. The eight detainees were named as follows : Mr. E. G. Watunga, General Secretary, Commercial Workers' Union; Mr. I. Chigwendere, Acting General Secretary, African Trades Union Congress (A.T.U.C.); Mr. S. Mteyaunga, General Treasurer, A.T.U.C.; Mr. I. Nyarota, President, Paint Manufacturing Workers' Union; Mr. P. Veremu, General Secretary, Paint Manufacturing Workers' Union; Mr. M. Nzirimasanga, Financial Secretary, Zimbabwe African Congress of Unions (Z.A.C.U.); Mr. C. Kanda, Organising Secretary, Cold Storage Workers' Union; Mr. N. Mumba, Organising Secretary, Z.A.C.U. The case of Mr. Veremu was raised in its communication dated 29 September 1964 by the International Federation of Industrial Organisations and General Workers' Unions, to which his union is affiliated. In its communication dated 20 October 1964 I.C.F.T.U. stated that, in addition, Mr. D. Mudzi, Clerk, A.T.U.C., had been detained at the Wha Wha Prison, and four more trade unionists detained at Gonakudzingwa: Messrs. M. Mpofu, Branch Chairman, African Railway Workers' Union; Mr. V. Moyo, Shop Steward, Municipal Workers' Union; Mr. S. Ndlovu, Committee Member, Municipal Workers' Union; Mr. J. Chatagwe, Branch Organiser, Commercial Workers' Union. The names of three further alleged detainees at the Marandellas Camp were given by I.C.F.T.U. in its communication dated 4 November 1964 as Mr. E. B. Dengwani, Administrative Secretary, Catering and Hotel Workers' Union; Mr. T. T. Japa, Branch Chairman, Municipal Workers' Union; Mr. A. Ndlovu, General Secretary, Z.A.C.U.

45. In a communication dated 6 November 1964 the Government of the United Kingdom forwarded the following observations prepared by the Government of Southern Rhodesia. It was stated that the allegations were groundless, that there were no restrictions on freedom of association for trade union purposes and that no repressive measures had been taken against trade unions. There were 59 registered and eight unregistered trade unions, with a total of over 400 officials, none of whom, said the Government of Southern Rhodesia, were prevented from carrying out their normal trade union activities and functions. The nine persons mentioned in the complaint of I.C.F.T.U. dated 4 September 1964, it was stated, were not restricted or detained because of their trade union activities but for subversive activities in no way connected with trade unionism. The Government of Southern Rhodesia considered that the Committee should " invite the complaining organisation to withdraw its misplaced assertion ".

46. In a further communication from the Government of the United Kingdom dated 9 November 1964 it was confirmed that Mr. Veremu was detained in the same circumstances.

47. In a communication dated 15 February 1965 from the Government it was stated that, according to the Government of Southern Rhodesia, the three persons mentioned in the complaint of I.C.F.T.U. dated 4 November 1964 had been detained for subversive activities not in any way connected with trade unionism and that, of the other 14 persons named in the earlier complaints, only six were trade unionists or officials, namely Messrs. Watunga, Chigwendere, Mteyaunga, Nyarota, Veremu and Nzirimasanga. The Government of Southern Rhodesia repeated in substance its earlier remarks concerning the exercise of freedom of association in Southern Rhodesia.

48. When the Committee considered the case at its meeting in February 1965, it pointed out that in the past [1], where allegations that trade union leaders or workers have been arrested or detained on account of trade union activities have been met by governments with statements that the arrests or detentions were made for subversive activities for reasons of internal security or for common law crimes, the Committee has always followed the rule that the governments concerned should be requested to submit further information as precise as possible concerning the arrests or detentions and the exact reasons therefor. If in certain cases the Committee had concluded that allegations relating to the arrest or detention of active trade unionists do not call for further examination, this had been after it had received information from the governments showing in a sufficiently clear and detailed way that the arrests or detentions were in no way occasioned by trade union activities but solely by activities outside the trade union sphere which were either prejudicial to public order or of a political nature.[2]

49. The Committee observed that the Government had given no detailed reasons for the detentions and compulsory residence orders which it admitted to have been issued in the case of the individuals mentioned by the complainants.

50. In accordance with the practice referred to in paragraph 48 above the Committee therefore decided to request the Government to be good enough to inform it of the exact reasons for the arrest or banishment of the individuals in question.

51. Noting, moreover, that the complainants alleged that the persons mentioned were arrested without being tried, the Committee, in view of the importance it has always attached to the right of all detained persons to receive a fair trial at the earliest possible moment [1], decided to request the Government to be good enough to inform it whether legal proceedings had been instituted against the persons concerned and, if so, to furnish copies of the judgments given and of the reasons adduced therein.

52. These requests for further information were transmitted to the Government by a letter dated 9 March 1965.

53. In a communication dated 27 February 1965 W.F.T.U. alleged that various trade union leaders had been placed in detention without trial. Several of the persons referred to were persons already cited by I.C.F.T.U. In addition the following eight further persons were alleged to have been detained: Mr. L. Nkala, Deputy Secretary, Bulawayo Region, Z.A.C.U.; Mr. J. Maika, President, Textile Workers' Union; Mr. E. Mpofu, Organising Secretary, Municipal Workers' Union; Mr. A. Mkwanazi, Branch Committee Member, Municipal Workers' Union; Mr. B. Mguni, Secretary, National Union of Building Workers; Mr. L. Sihwa, President, Artisan Workers' Union; Mr. X. Lubimbi, President, Bakery and Confectionery Workers' Union; Mr. L. Masahwi, General Secretary, Dairy Workers' Union.

54. W.F.T.U. alleged also that on 27 January 1965 the Government of Southern Rhodesia had declared Z.A.C.U. to be an unlawful organisation, as being " dangerous or prejudicial to peace, good order, or constitutional government ".

55. On 27 April 1965 I.C.F.T.U. submitted a revised list of 28 trade unionists alleged to be under detention or restriction at Wha Wha, Marandellas or Gonakudzingwa. I.C.F.T.U. said that four of the trade unionists referred to in paragraph 44 above had been released —Messrs. E. G. Watunga, S. Ndlovu, E. B. Dengwani and T. T. Japa—together with a Mr. O. Chikowero, not previously mentioned. The 28 persons still said to be detained included the remaining 13 of the 17 named in paragraph 44 above and three of the persons named by W.F.T.U. (see paragraph 53)—Messrs. B. Mguni, E. Mpofu and L. Nakala. I.C.F.T.U. did not mention the other five named by W.F.T.U. The 12 new names in the I.C.F.T.U. list were Messrs. M. Dengazi, Southern Rhodesia Tobacco Workers' Union; P. C. Bvunzawabaya, Organising Secretary, Motor Trade Workers' Union; C. Mudakureba, Commercial and Allied Workers' Union; C. Muza, Regional Organiser, Z.A.C.U.; A. Dunjana, Branch Chairman, Tailor and Garment Workers' Union; A. Masawi, Regional Organiser, Z.A.C.U.; J. M. Matshazi, Railway African Workers' Union; P. J. Mpofu, General Secretary, Agricultural and Plantation Workers' Union; J. R. Mzimela, Commercial and Allied Workers' Union; I. Nkomo, Municipal Workers' Union; Z. Phiri, African Railway Workers' Union; and J. B. Shura, Regional Secretary, Z.A.C.U.

56. The complaint of W.F.T.U. dated 27 February 1965 was transmitted to the Government on 15 March 1965; that of I.C.F.T.U. dated 27 April 1965 was sent to the Government on 6 May 1965.

57. At its meeting in May 1965 the Committee adjourned its examination of the case as it had not received either the Government's observations on the two last-mentioned complaints or the further information requested by the Committee at its preceding session.

58. In a communication dated 2 September 1965 the Government of the United Kingdom stated that the Government of Southern Rhodesia had requested that the following reply be forwarded:

The Government notes that despite the several observations already made and considered by the Committee on 18 February 1965 the Committee was unable to invite the complaining organisations to withdraw their misplaced assertions and that the Committee now calls for further detailed information on certain points of the complaint made by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions and the International Federation of Industrial Organisations and General Workers' Unions of alleged infringements of trade union rights. The observations already furnished were made to assist the Committee in their assessment of the merits of the complaints and were not intended as evidence in rebuttal of the allegations. The observations were unambiguous. The persons concerned were not detained or subjected to compulsory residence orders for any trade union association or trade union activities, but for subversion.

It is the view of Government that as the Committee, despite the assurance given, wish to examine the complaints in greater detail, they should call upon the complaining organisations to submit the factual evidence, if any, on which they made their complaint, that the persons concerned were detained or made subject to compulsory residence orders because of their trade union associations or trade union activities.

The allegations by the World Federation of Trade Unions are substantially the same as those by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions and the International Federation of Industrial Organisations and General Workers' Unions and our observations on those complaints apply equally to those now made by the World Federation of Trade Unions.

59. At its meeting in November 1965 the Committee adjourned its examination of the case until its present session.

60. On 2 December 1965 I.C.F.T.U. submitted to the I.L.O. further allegations relating to the detention of trade unionists. In addition to the persons named in its complaint dated 27 April 1965, declared I.C.F.T.U., the following trade unionists had been restricted at the Gonakudzingwa camp, without trial, some of them for over one year: Messrs. Z. Sigola, F. Chimbganda, J. Kabiya, J. S. Moyo, M. Togwe, J. Mzaca and J. M. Goromonzi, all belonging to the Rhodesia African Teachers' Association; Mr. L. Zaranyika, Chairman of the Mangwende East Branch of the Rhodesia African Teachers' Association; Mr. G. Mudavanhu, (Southern) Rhodesia Petrol and Oil Storage Distributive Workers' Union.

61. I.C.F.T.U. referred also to the case of Mr. Edward Chifamba, General Secretary of the (Southern) Rhodesia Post and Telecommunications Workers' Association. The complainant alleged that he was arrested on 17 November 1965 in Salisbury, immediately after a meeting of his union convened in post office premises with the express permission of the Postmaster-General, that is to say, while he was performing his normal trade union functions. It was stated that Mr. Chifamba had been suspended from his post office employment and was being held under the emergency legislation providing for the holding of any person for up to 30 days and that there was an imminent danger of his being subject to restricted residence thereafter.

62. Support for this complaint was expressed in communications addressed to the I.L.O., on 7 December 1965 and 4 January 1966, by the International Federation of Free Teachers' Unions and the Postal, Telegraph and Telephone International respectively.

63. A copy of the complaint of I.C.F.T.U. dated 2 December 1965 was transmitted to the Government of the United Kingdom on 22 December 1965 for any comments that the Government might wish to make thereon.

64. In a communication dated 7 February 1966 the Government of the United Kingdom, referring especially to the complaint of I.C.F.T.U. dated 2 December 1965 (see paragraph 60 above), declares that it deplores all infringements of trade union rights. It goes on to point out that the allegations relating to detentions of trade unionists raised in this case were the subject of considerable correspondence and discussions prior to 11 November 1965 with the then Southern Rhodesian authorities, in the course of which the Government of the United Kingdom urged those authorities to co-operate to the fullest possible extent with the Committee in its examination of the case and, in particular, to provide the information requested by the Committee. It urged the same authorities to consider most carefully the various allegations which had been made, and if in any particular case it appeared that an individual had been arrested or detained in such circumstances as to constitute an infringement of trade union rights to take appropriate steps to remedy the situation urgently.

65. However, states the Government of the United Kingdom, " the former Government of Southern Rhodesia illegally purported to declare independence on 11 November 1965, on which date Mr. Smith and his Ministers were dismissed from office ". The Government concludes by saying that " when fully constitutional authority has been restored in Rhodesia the complaints communicated by the I.C.F.T.U. and other bodies, together with the observations already made by the Committee . . . will be brought in due course to the attention of the competent authorities ".

66. In view of the serious political developments in Southern Rhodesia to which the Government of the United Kingdom refers in its communication dated 7 February 1966, no useful purpose would be served by further consideration of the observations prepared by the Government of Southern Rhodesia which were forwarded by the Government of the United Kingdom on 2 September 1965.

67. In these circumstances the Committee recommends the Governing Body—

(a) to take note of the communication dated 7 February 1966 from the Government of the United Kingdom and, in particular—

(i) to take note with satisfaction of the Government's assurance that it deplores all infringements of trade union rights and of the representations it made to the authorities in Southern Rhodesia, prior to the unilateral declaration of independence by the authorities in Southern Rhodesia on 11 November 1965, urging those authorities to co-operate with the Committee and furnish information requested by it and to take urgent steps to remedy any infringement of trade union rights that might be found to have occurred;

(ii) to take note of the Government's further assurance that, when fully constitutional authority has been restored in Southern Rhodesia, the complaints presented in this case and the observations already made by the Committee will be brought in due course to the attention of the competent authorities;

(b) to request the Government of the United Kingdom to be good enough to keep the Governing Body informed of further developments in the matter.

Allegations relating to the Provisions of the Industrial Conciliation Act, 1959

68. The Committee, having already considered these allegations at its meetings in November 1961 [1], May 1962 [2], October 1962 [3], May 1963 [4], February 1964 [5], November 1964 [6] and February 1965 [7], examined them further at its meeting in May 1965, when it submitted to the Governing Body the conclusions and recommendations contained in paragraphs 90 to 111 of its 83rd Report, which was approved by the Governing Body at its 162nd Session (May-June 1965).

69. At its meeting in May 1965 the Committee had before it the text of the Industrial Conciliation Amendment Act, 1964, which the Government had furnished, when it resumed its examination of the allegations still outstanding—those relating to the registration of trade unions under the Industrial Conciliation Act, 1959, and those relating to the organising rights of agricultural workers and domestic servants.

70. So far as the registration issue was concerned, the Committee observed that, while the new Act had made provision for the right of appeal to the Industrial Court in all cases where the registration or proposed changes in the existing registration of a trade union or employers' organisation were refused by the Industrial Registrar, section 37 (1) (b) and (c) of the 1959 Act setting forth the conditions concerning which the Registrar must be satisfied before registering a trade union or employers' organisation had not been amended. The Committee therefore pointed out once again, in paragraph 98 of its 83rd Report, that the question as to whether the particular requirements laid down are fulfilled is one upon which the Registrar has to form his own judgment, and again drew attention to the fact that the I.L.O. Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations had observed that, in such cases, " the existence of a procedure of appeal to the courts does not appear to be a sufficient guarantee; in effect this does not alter the nature of the powers conferred on the authorities responsible for effecting registration, and the judges hearing such an appeal ... would only be able to ensure that the legislation had been correctly applied ".[1] In this connection, the Committee concluded, the amending Act appeared in no way to alter the degree of judgment entrusted to the Registrar.

71. With regard to the situation of agricultural workers and domestic servants the Committee recalled in paragraph 103 of its 83rd Report that in 1961 the I.L.O. Committee of Experts, in an observation [2], had regretted to note that the Industrial Conciliation Act, 1959, by virtue of section 4 (2) (a) thereof, did not apply to " persons in respect of their employment in farming operations (including forestry) or any domestic persons in private households " and had stated that it would be glad if the Government would indicate the measures which it was proposed to take to guarantee the right of these workers " to associate for all lawful purposes ", as required by the Right of Association (Non-Metropolitan Territories) Convention, 1947 (No. 84), which applies to all employed persons. The Committee recalled also that, during the 45th (1961) Session of the International Labour Conference, a representative of the Government of Southern Rhodesia intervening on the request of the representative of the Government of the United Kingdom had stated before the Conference Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations that the question of including agricultural workers and domestic servants within the Industrial Conciliation Act would be further considered in the light of the Committee of Experts' observations.[3]

72. The Committee observed further, in paragraph 109 of its 83rd Report, that the I.L.O. Committee of Experts, in March 1965, had noted with regret that, although the Act had been the subject of extensive amendments, no measures had been taken to extend its scope to persons engaged in farming operations or to domestic servants, and that the Government merely proposed to study this question. The Committee of Experts had stated that it trusted that measures would be taken without further delay to extend the Act to the abovementioned categories of workers and thus bring the territory's legislation into conformity with the said Convention No. 84, which guarantees the right " to associate for all lawful purposes " to all employed persons.[4]

73. Accordingly, the Committee submitted the following recommendations to the Governing Body in paragraph 111 of its 83rd Report:

[1] See Report of the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations (Articles 19, 22 and 35 of the Constitution), Report III (Part IV), International Labour Conference, 43rd Session, Geneva, 1959 (Geneva, I.L.O., 1959), pp. 107-108.

With regard to the case as a whole the Committee recommends the Governing Body—

(a) to decide with regard to the allegations relating to the registration of trade unions under the Industrial Conciliation Act, 1959—

(i) to take note with satisfaction of the fact that the Industrial Conciliation Amendment Act, 1964, now provides for the right of appeal to the Industrial Court in all cases where the registration or proposed changes in the existing registration of a trade union or employers' organisation are refused by the Industrial Registrar;

(ii) to draw the attention of the Government once again, having regard to the observations of the I.L.O. Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations referred to in paragraph 98 above, to the desirability of defining clearly in the legislation the precise conditions which trade unions must fulfil in order to be entitled to registration and of prescribing specific statutory criteria for the purpose of deciding whether such conditions are fulfilled or not;

(iii) to suggest to the Government that consideration be given to further amending the Industrial Conciliation Act, 1959, so as to give full effect to the principle set forth in the preceding clause, and to request the Government to be good enough to keep the Governing Body informed of any further developments in this connection;

(b) to decide with regard to the allegations relating to the organising rights of agricultural workers and domestic servants—

(i) to draw the attention of the Government once again to the fact that, in undertaking to apply the Right of Association (Non-Metropolitan Territories) Convention, 1947 (No. 84), without modification to Southern Rhodesia, it has assumed the obligation under Article 2 of that Convention to guarantee the right of all employed persons " to associate for all lawful purposes ";

(ii) to request the Government again—having regard to the observations made in 1961 and 1965 by the I.L.O. Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations, as indicated in paragraphs 103 and 109 above, and to the statement of a Government representative to the Conference Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations in 1961 that the question of the inclusion of agricultural workers and domestic servants within the Industrial Conciliation Act, 1959, would be further considered in the light of the observation of the Committee of Experts—to indicate what measures it is proposed to take to give full effect to Article 2 of the said Convention in respect to these categories of workers.

74. These conclusions, having been approved as cited above by the Governing Body at its 162nd Session (May-June 1965), were communicated to the Government of the United Kingdom by a letter dated 2 June 1965.

75. In a letter dated 13 August 1965 the Government of the United Kingdom stated that the Government of Southern Rhodesia had requested it to inform the Committee that the time was not considered opportune for amending the Industrial Conciliation Act as suggested by the Governing Body, that agricultural workers and domestic servants were not denied the right " to associate for all lawful purposes " and that at this stage the protection of the Act was considered unnecessary.

76. The Committee regrets to observe that, having regard to the statement of the representative of the Government of Southern Rhodesia, on the invitation of the representative of the Government of the United Kingdom, to the Conference Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations in 1961, which is referred to in paragraph 71 above, the Government of Southern Rhodesia should have requested the Government of the United Kingdom in August 1965 to convey this intimation to the Committee. However, in view of the political events which have since taken place in Southern Rhodesia, and having regard to the contents of the communication dated 7 February 1966 from the Government of the United Kingdom, the Committee, while reaffirming the considerations set forth in paragraph 111 of its 83rd Report cited in paragraph 73 above, does not consider that any useful purpose would be served by pursuing this aspect of the matter further at the present stage. It nevertheless recommends the Governing Body to request the Government of the United Kingdom to be good enough to keep the Governing Body informed of further developments in the matter.

77. In all the circumstances the Committee recommends the Governing Body—

(1) with regard to the allegations relating to detentions of trade unionists—

(a) to take note of the communication dated 7 February 1966 from the Government of the United Kingdom and, in particular—

(i) to take note with satisfaction of the Government's assurance that it deplores all infringements of trade union rights and of the representations it made to the authorities in Southern Rhodesia, prior to the unilateral declaration of independence by the authorities in Southern Rhodesia on 11 November 1965, urging those authorities to co-operate with the Committee and furnish information requested by it and to take urgent steps to remedy any infringement of trade union rights that might be found to have occurred;

(ii) to take note of the Government's further assurance that, when fully constitutional authority has been restored in Southern Rhodesia, the complaints presented in this case and the observations already made by the Committee will be brought in due course to the attention of the competent authorities;

(b) to request the Government of the United Kingdom to be good enough to keep the Governing Body informed of further developments in the matter;

(2) to request the Government of the United Kingdom, with regard to the allegations relating to the provisions of the Industrial Conciliation Act, 1959, to be good enough to inform the Governing Body of any further developments.

Case No. 363:

Complaint Presented by the World Federation of Trade Unions against the Government of Colombia

78. The Committee has already examined this case at its 36th Session in February 1964. On that occasion the Committee presented to the Governing Body an interim report containing its final conclusions on the majority of the allegations relating to the case, recommending it at the same time to request the Government to supply additional information on other allegations. These conclusions and recommendations, which are contained in paragraphs 201 to 241 of the 74th Report of the Committee, were adopted by the Governing Body at its 159th Session (Geneva, June-July 1964).

79. The following paragraphs deal only with the allegations which remained in abeyance and which refer to violations of trade union rights committed when a demonstration by strikers at Puerto Boyacá was broken up, one worker being killed and others injured.

80. Colombia has ratified neither the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), nor the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98).

81. In its complaint dated 11 October 1963 the World Federation of Trade Unions maintained that on 24 August of that year a meeting of strikers at Puerto Boyacá was attacked by forces of repression, one worker being killed and others wounded. In its reply the Government stated that the meeting had taken place in spite of the prohibition on the holding of public demonstrations, that the demonstrators had attacked the forces of law and order and that with a view to ascertaining responsibility an inquiry had been opened under a criminal investigating magistrate and the Military Judge Advocate's Office.

82. Examining the case at its February 1964 session the Committee observed that in similar cases in which it had been alleged that people had been killed when the police opened fire on strikers the Committee had pointed out that, in cases in which the dispersal of public assemblies, etc., by the police on grounds of public order or similar grounds had involved loss of life, it attached special importance to the circumstances being fully investigated by an immediate and independent special inquiry and to the regular legal procedure being followed to determine the justification and responsibility for the action taken by the police. The Committee noted that in the present case the Government had denied that the forces of law and order were responsible for the alleged occurrence. In view of the fact that the Government had stated that the necessary judicial inquiries had been started, the Committee recommended the Governing Body to ask the Government to be good enough to inform it of the result of these inquiries.[1]

83. At its sessions in November 1964 and February, May and November 1965 the Committee postponed examination of the case as it was awaiting the information requested from the Government.

84. By a communication dated 11 January 1966 the Government furnished the text of the verdict at the hearing of second instance delivered by the Military High Court on 28 September 1965 in the case opened in order to investigate the occurrence and determine responsibilities.

85. In the part relating to the grounds of the Military High Court's verdict it is stated that the investigation of the facts was originally entrusted to a municipal police inspector of Puerto Boyacá but was taken over " successively " by a criminal examining magistrate and two military penal examining magistrates.

86. The text of the document sent by the Government gives a summary of the conclusions of the inquiry and extracts from the statements of many people who were present at or took part in the incident. In brief, the facts as they emerge from these conclusions originated in a strike declared by the workers of the Texas Company. The activities of the strikers had given rise to fears of breaches of the peace, to avoid which the Military Governor of Puerto Boyacá issued Decree No. 044 of 20 August 1963, which ruled that as from that date and until further notice permission to organise demonstrations of any nature whatsoever within the town limits was entirely suspended. Notwithstanding the prohibition, on 24 August a meeting, organised by Mr. Ítalo Daza, a member of the Chamber of Representatives, was held in the main square of the town. On being informed of this occurrence, the Governor sought the collaboration and help of the military patrols which had been detached to deal with disturbances or difficult situations. When an army captain personally requested Mr. Daza to stop the speech which he had begun, the latter replied that nobody was going to get him down from where he was. The participants in the demonstration protested and one of them, Mr. Adonái Ávila, went so far as to seize and strike the captain. In view of the threatening attitude of the demonstrators another officer and a patrol, under the command of a lance-corporal, intervened, the officer overpowering and arresting Mr. Ávila and the patrol attempting to disperse the demonstrators. At this point, it was alleged, the officers left, taking Mr. Ávila with them, and were stoned by the demonstrators as they went. Mr. Ávila himself confirmed in his statements that the vehicle in which he was taken away was hit by objects which he could not identify. According to the statements of several of its members, the patrol attempted to disperse the demonstrators, first by verbal orders, then with their rifle butts, and then by throwing tear-gas grenades, which were tossed back by the demonstrators before exploding. Then a number of shots, apparently 17, were fired by the patrol. According to the members of the patrol, these shots were fired in the air with the object of intimidating the demonstrators. The evidence showed that Mr. Martiniano Romero was killed, Mr. Siervo Galeano wounded and Mr. Carlos Trejos suffered contusions.

87. On the basis of the investigation, the Military High Court concluded, among other points, that the patrol had acted in accordance with its instructions and the orders governing the conduct of troops sent to maintain public order, in first giving verbal warnings, then using their rifle butts, then throwing tear-gas grenades and finally shooting. With regard to the rifle shots, the Court deduced that they were not fired directly at the demonstrators, because in that case the victims would have been much more numerous and that " owing to circumstances which it is impossible to ascertain, one or two of the shots fired might have been deflected " as a result of the pressure and contact which the demonstrators were exerting on the members of the patrol. The Court concluded that the soldiers had legitimately made use of their firearms and that their action was justified, and it confirmed the judgment of non-suit, though it applied this to the preliminary proceedings as a ruling on their probatory value and not as a verdict on the members of the patrol, as these had not been indicted in the proceedings.

88. The Committee notes that the inquiry, which was first entrusted to the ordinary police and judicial authorities, was concluded by the military penal authorities, through hearings of first and second instance.

89. The Committee has always applied the principle that allegations relating to the exercise of the right to strike are within its competence, in so far but only in so far as they affect the exercise of trade union rights[1], and on many occasions[2] has recommended the Governing Body to affirm that the right to strike of workers and workers' organisations constitutes an essential means of promoting and defending their occupational interests. The Committee, however, has rejected allegations relating to strikes by reason of their non-occupational character[3], or where they have been designed to coerce a government with respect to a political matter[4], or have been directed against the government's policy and not " in furtherance of a trade dispute ".[5] On the other hand, in many cases laid before it[6], the Committee has emphasised that freedom of meeting is an essential element in trade union rights. In Case No. 62 (Netherlands)[7], however, the Committee affirmed that, although the right of holding trade union meetings is a basic requisite of the free exercise of trade union rights, the organisations concerned must observe the general provisions relating to public meetings, which are applicable to all.

90. The Committee notes the Government's statement that, in the present case, the prohibition on demonstrations constituted a local measure based on grounds of public order and did not relate only to the meeting of members of the trade union which was on strike, and that the meeting to which the complaint relates was not held on trade union premises but in a public square, in spite of that prohibition. Further, it appears to have been called by a Member of Parliament, whose connection with the trade union is not explained.

91. In these circumstances, with regard to the allegations the examination of which had remained in abeyance in this case, the Committee recommends the Governing Body—

(b) to draw the Government's attention to the importance which it has always attached, in circumstances similar to those of the present case, to a full investigation of the facts through an immediate and independent inquiry, and to the regular legal procedure being followed.

Case No. 202:

Complaint Presented by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions against the Government of Thailand

92. This case, already considered by the Committee at its 24th, 25th, 26th, 27th, 28th, 29th, 30th, 31st, 33rd and 34th Sessions (February 1960[1], May 1960[2], November 1960[3], February 1961[4], May 1961[5], November 1961[6], February 1962[7], May 1962[8], February 1963[9], and May 1963[10]), was further examined by the Committee at its 40th Session (May 1965), when it submitted a further interim report in paragraphs 74 to 89 of its 83rd Report, which was approved by the Governing Body at its 162nd Session (May-June 1965).

93. Paragraph 89 of the Committee's 83rd Report contains the recommendations of the Committee, as adopted by the Governing Body, and reads as follows:

In all the circumstances the Committee recommends the Governing Body—

(a) to draw the attention of the Government once again, as it has done on a number of previous occasions, to the fact that the situation of the workers of Thailand, who since the dissolution of all the trade unions in Thailand in October 1958 have been unable to form and join trade union organisations for the protection of their interests, is contrary to generally recognised principles relating to freedom of association;

(b) to express its disappointment that, after stating on 26 April 1961 that a new Labour Act had been finalised and would be submitted to the Legislative Assembly as soon as possible, the Government now states, almost four years later, that a law on trade unions will not be considered until after the promulgation of a new Constitution;

(c) to urge the Government in the meantime to take steps to enable the workers to form trade unions to protect their interests and to request the Government to inform the Governing Body of the measures taken or intended to be taken in this connection;

(d) to request the Government to be good enough to furnish a text of the Announcement of the Ministry of the Interior on the protection of workers and to inform it as to the provisions of the Labour Protection Bill which it states is intended to amend the said announcement;

(e) to request the Government to state whether the Governing Body is correct in assuming that all the persons named in paragraphs 83 and 85 above are now at liberty;

(f) to reaffirm yet again the importance which the Governing Body has always attached to the principle of prompt and fair trial by an independent and impartial judiciary in all cases, including cases in which trade unionists are charged with political or criminal offences which the Government considers have no relation to their trade union functions; and to draw the attention of the Government to its view that the continued detention of Mr. Sang Phathanothai and the other persons named in paragraph 87 above, against whom, after a long period of previous detention, court proceedings began on 5 October 1962 and are still pending, is incompatible with the said principle;

(g) to request the Government to be good enough to inform the Governing Body, as a matter of urgency, as to when it is anticipated that the pending proceedings against the persons in question will be concluded, and to furnish a copy of the judgment and of the reasons adduced therein.

94. The above requests to furnish further information were brought to the notice of the Government by a letter dated 2 June 1965. Further information was furnished by the Government by a communication dated 18 November 1965.

95. With regard to the question of taking steps to enable the workers to form trade unions to protect their interests, which the Governing Body urged the Government to do when it approved paragraph 89 (c) of the Committee's 83rd Report cited above, the Government states that the problems concerning the formation of trade unions have been continually studied and that a Bill on the settlement of labour disputes has been submitted to the legislative organisation and is expected to become law within a year.

96. With regard to the matters referred to in paragraph 89 (d) of the Committee's 83rd Report, the Government, while forwarding the texts of the announcements on the protection of workers issued by the Ministry of the Interior, states that the Labour Protection Bill is still in process of being drafted.

97. The first of the announcements referred to by the Government, issued on 31 October 1958, lists a number of diseases considered to be incidental to the nature or conditions of employment or arising from employment. The second and third, issued on 20 December 1958, and amended in certain respects on 23 March 1964, relate to rules and methods of payment and the amount of compensation and to working hours, holidays of employees, conditions of woman and child labour, payment of wages and welfare services. The fourth, issued on 5 January 1959, specifies the work considered to be detrimental to the health of employees and the work considered to be light work. The fifth, dated 23 March 1964, lays down rules regarding the weekly holiday.

98. In paragraph 89 (e) of its 83rd Report the Committee recommended the Governing Body to request the Government to confirm that the trade unionists referred to in paragraphs 83 and 85 of that report were now at liberty.

99. In its communication dated 18 November 1965 the Government states that these persons have enjoyed their full freedom since the dates on which they were released.

100. The Government states that the court has acquitted Mr. Sang Phathanothai, former President and later General Secretary of the Thai National Trades Union Congress, and that the order for his release was effected on 9 September 1965.

101. Finally, the Government states that the court proceedings (which began on 5 October 1962) are still pending in the cases of the seven other persons named in paragraph 87 of the Committee's 83rd Report: Mr. Prasert Khamplumchitr, Mr. Thongbai Thongpound, Mr. Vichitr Mahasin, Mr. Chamnong Harith, Mr. Prakob Tolaklam, Mr. Yunfa Sae Lau and Mr. Karuna Kuslasai.

102. In all the circumstances the Committee recommends the Governing Body—

(a) to take note of the texts of announcements issued by the Minister of the Interior but, while appreciating that these announcements constitute a body of protective labour legislation, to draw the attention of the Government once again to the fact that the situation of the workers in Thailand, who since the dissolution of all the trade unions in Thailand in October 1958 have been unable to form and join trade unions for the protection of their interests, is contrary to generally recognised principles relating to freedom of association;

(b) to request the Government to be good enough to keep the Governing Body informed as to further developments with regard to the proposed Labour Protection Bill and to furnish the text thereof when it has been finalised;

(c) to note the Government's statement that the problems concerning the formation of trade unions have been continually studied, to express the hope that legislative action on this matter will be taken at the earliest possible moment, and to urge the Government once again to take steps in the meantime to enable the workers to form trade unions to protect their interests and to request the Government to be good enough to inform the Governing Body of the measures taken or intended to be taken in this connection;

(d) to note the Government's statement that the persons referred to in paragraphs 83 and 85 of the Committee's 83rd Report have enjoyed their full freedom since the dates on which they were released;

(e) to note the Government's statement that Mr. Sang Phathanothai, former President and later General Secretary of the Thai National Trades Union Congress, has been acquitted by the court and that the order for his release was effected on 9 September 1965;

(f) to reaffirm yet again the importance which the Governing Body has always attached to the principle of prompt and fair trial by an independent and impartial judiciary in all cases, including cases in which trade unionists are charged with political or criminal offences which the Government considers have no relation to their trade union functions;

(g) to draw the attention of the Government once again to its view that the continued detention of the persons named in paragraph 101 above, against whom, after a long period of previous detention, court proceedings began on 5 October 1962 and are still pending, is incompatible with the principle enunciated in the preceding subparagraph;

(h) to request the Government to be good enough to inform the Governing Body, as a matter of urgency, as to when it is anticipated that the pending proceedings against the persons in question will be concluded, and to furnish a copy of the judgments and of the reasons adduced therein.

Cases Nos. 283, 329 and 425:

Complaints Presented by the International Federation of Christian Trade Unions, the Economic Corporation of Cuba (in Exile) and the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions against the Government of Cuba

103. The Committee considered these three cases together at its meeting held in May 1965, when it submitted the interim conclusions contained in paragraphs 125 to 170 of its 83rd Report, which was approved by the Governing Body at its 162nd Session (May-June 1965). In that report the Committee submitted its definitive conclusions and recommendations concerning two series of allegations: (a) those relating to the imprisonment of the trade union leader Reinaldo González and (b) those relating to the dissolution of employers' organisations. Thus the only allegations consideration of which has remained in suspense are those put forward by I.C.F.T.U. concerning the detention of trade union officials; in this connection the Government was asked to supply detailed information (see paragraph 170 of the aforesaid report).

104. In a communication dated 5 November 1965, transmitted by the Permanent Delegation of Cuba in Geneva on 13 December 1965, the Government answered that request for information.

105. Cuba has ratified the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), and the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98).

Allegations concerning Which the Committee Has Already Submitted Its Definitive Conclusions to the Governing Body

106. In the same communication dated 5 November 1965 the Government made certain observations on the two aspects of the case concerning which the Committee had already submitted its definitive conclusions and recommendations. In the case of Mr. Reinaldo González the Government emphasised in general terms the guarantees afforded by judicial procedures in Cuba. These observations have no particular reference to the case in point and do not affect the conclusions previously reached by the Committee. With regard to the allegations concerning the dissolution of employers' organisations the Government puts forward further arguments concerning the irreceivability of the complaint and the substances of the allegations made by the Economic Corporation of Cuba (in exile).

107. In so far as the question of receivability of the complaint of the Economic Corporation of Cuba (in exile) is concerned, the Government refers to the enactments by which this organisation and some of its constituent members were dissolved and argues that, by their nature, they were not organisations in the sense of the I.L.O. Constitution or of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87).

108. The Committee has already stated in paragraph 148 of its 83rd Report the grounds on which it concluded that the complaint was receivable and does not consider that the latest communication from the Government contains any new information of such a nature as to cause it to modify that conclusion.

109. With regard to the substance of the complaint the Government states that it disagrees with the findings contained in paragraph 170 of the Committee's 83rd Report. It presents arguments based on Act No. 647 of 24 November 1959 and Act No. 907 of 1960, the provisions of which were considered by the Committee in paragraphs 151 to 154 of its 83rd Report, and arguments based on the factual situation of the organisations concerned, which add nothing new to the observations analysed in paragraph 150 of that report.

110. For these reasons the Committee does not consider that, in the light of the reply now received from the Government, it is called upon to modify the recommendations made in paragraph 170 (2) of its 83rd Report.

Allegations relating to the Detention of Trade Union Officials

111. The complaint is contained in a communication from I.C.F.T.U. dated 17 December 1964. The complainant stated that a number of trade union officials had been imprisoned for alleged " counter-revolutionary activities " and requested the Governing Body to set up a fact-finding commission with a view to ascertaining the equity of the judicial procedure applied to the officials in question and the way they were treated in prison.[1] The Government furnished its observations on 6 April 1965.

112. When examining the case at its meeting held in May 1965, the Committee, following its invariable practice in such cases, before expressing a view on the complainants' request for a fact-finding commission, recommended the Governing Body to ask the Government to furnish as soon as possible detailed information on the acts for which the persons mentioned in the complaint were convicted and the texts of the judgments handed down in each case, with their grounds.

113. In its communication dated 5 November 1965 the Government supplied the information requested with regard to 12 of the 24 persons whose names and activities were listed in the complaint, with the texts of the judgments given against them in public hearings by various Councils of War (revolutionary courts).

[1] See 83rd Report, paras. 160-162.

114. According to this information, Francisco Javier González Fernández was sentenced to one year's imprisonment for the offence of embezzling public funds; Francisco Aguirre Vidaurreta to nine years' deprivation of freedom for an offence against the unity and stability of the nation; José Lauro Blanco Muñiz to 20 years' rigorous imprisonment for offences against the State; Gabriel Hernández Custodio, Julio Padrón Rodriguez, Ramón del Bosque Chacón and Ángel Hernández Pérez to 12 years' deprivation of freedom for participation in a counter-revolutionary organisation styled " Movement of 30 November " and for offences against the unity and stability of the nation; Basilio Medina Luna to ten years' rigorous imprisonment for the offence of acts against public safety; Henry Martínez López to 20 years' rigorous imprisonment for offences against the unity and stability of the nation, attempted homicide, arson and destruction of property; Diego Herrera Rubio to nine years' imprisonment for offences against the unity and stability of the nation; Carlos Rubiera Feito to 20 years' rigorous imprisonment for the same offence; José Ulises Díaz González to 12 years' rigorous imprisonment for an offence against the authority of the State. Additional penalties imposed on all of the persons tried were suspension of civil rights, subjection to supervision by the public authorities for a period equal to the main prison sentence and, by virtue of Act No. 664 of 1959, confiscation of all their property.

115. The Government states that the provisions regarding the jurisdiction and competence of the judicial institutions which acted in the said cases, the procedural provisions and safeguards and the penal provisions respecting the above-mentioned counter-revolutionary offences, are contained in the constitutional and legal texts communicated to the Committee in connection with the examination of Case No. 283 relating to Mr. Reinaldo González; that in all those cases it had been proved before the competent courts that the persons sentenced had committed the offences of which they were accused and which were punishable under legislation promulgated prior to the offence; and that, finally, the activities in question had nothing in common with genuine trade union activities.

116. When examining Case No. 283 in its 83rd Report, the Committee observed from the documents sent by the Government that Mr. González and other persons accused with him were tried by a revolutionary court under the extraordinary procedure laid down in the 1896 Act governing trials in the Republic of Cuba under arms, as a result of which the offences they had been accused of were regarded as " counter-revolutionary ".[1] The Committee recalled in this connection that in cases where it had established that an exceptional procedure is being followed it had always reasserted the importance it attached to the observance in such circumstances of all the guarantees afforded by due legal process.[2] The Committee observed, on the basis of the information supplied by the Government in the shape of documents relating to the trial and the fact that the accused were able to employ the services of a number of defence counsel during the trial, that the Government appeared to have provided certain safeguards for the defence, despite the exceptional character of the procedure.[3]

117. With regard to the 12 other trade union leaders mentioned in the complaint the Government stated that the data provided by the complainants were insufficient and that it required further information in order to identify the cases. In this connection the Committee observes that the complainants have not sent any additional information within the space of one month granted for that purpose. According to the text of the complaint, as it was communicated to the Government, the 12 trade unionists are Luis Miguel Linsuain, General Secretary of the Gastronomic Federation of Oriente Province, who was sentenced to seven years' imprisonment; Alberto García, General Secretary of the National Medical Federation, sentenced to 30 years' imprisonment; Antonio Dagas, Deputy General Secretary of the Cuban section of the Spanish trade union organisation National Confederation of Labour (C.N.T.), imprisoned in La Cubana fort; Leandro Barreras, member of the Executive Board of the National Federation of Sugar Workers; Norberto Abreu, Secretary of the Federation of Printing and Allied Trades, and Ángel Custodio, officer of the National Medical Federation, sentenced as counter-revolutionaries; Sara Carranza, employee at the headquarters of the Confederation of Cuban Workers (C.T.C.), sentenced to 30 years' imprisonment; Ada González Gallo, delegate of the Telephonists' Section of the Telephone Workers' Trade Union of Havana, and Carmen Méndez Linares, C.T.C. employee, sentenced to 20 years' imprisonment; Juan Manuel Reines, sentenced to ten years' imprisonment for being an officer of the trade union section of the clandestine movement; Arnoldo Muller Carbone, officer of a Havana trade union, and Jorge Blanco Ferrando, C.T.C. employee, sentenced to 20 years' imprisonment.

118. Lastly, with regard to the request made by the complainants to the Governing Body to set up a fact-finding commission, the Government states that it is a firm, invariable principle not to accept any form of intervention in its internal affairs, and not to accept investigations or inspections within the country regarding events and situations occurring there, only the national authorities and institutions being competent to examine such matters.

119. In this connection the Committee recalled that in its First Report [1] it expressed the hope that in future cases the preliminary observations of the governments would not anticipate any request for concurrence in the establishment of a fact-finding commission which the Governing Body might think it appropriate or inappropriate to make after it had had an opportunity of considering the facts of the case and expressing its views.

120. In the present case the Government of Cuba has supplied information as requested by the Governing Body, only with regard to the situation of 12 of the 24 trade unionists named in the complaint, stating that it would need more detailed information in order to identify the others. The Committee observes, however, that the complainants have, as indicated in paragraph 117 above, furnished the full names of these other 12 persons, given particulars as to the long prison sentences imposed on them (indicating in one case the place of detention), and indicated the trade union functions which they assumed. The Committee feels that, if further inquiries are made, it should be possible for the Government to identify these cases on the basis of the specific information already communicated to it.

121. In the circumstances the Committee recommends the Governing Body—

(a) with regard to the 12 trade union officials on whose situation the Government has supplied information, to emphasise to the Government, as it has already done previously, the importance which it attaches to the principle that accused trade unionists, like all other persons, should be entitled to the safeguards of normal judicial procedure;

(b) to invite the Government to co-operate by furnishing, as soon as possible, detailed information concerning the present situation of the trade union officials in question and of those referred to in paragraphs 117 and 120 above, as well as the texts of the judgments handed down in each instance and their grounds; and meanwhile to postpone consideration of the case;

(c) to take note of the present interim report of the Committee, it being understood that the Committee will report further to the Governing Body when the information referred to in subparagraph (b) above has been received.

Case No. 292:

Complaints Presented by the British Trades Union Congress and the National Union of Bank Employees against the Government of the United Kingdom

122. The Committee has already submitted interim reports on this case to the Governing Body in paragraphs 136 to 243 of its 67th Report and in paragraphs 222 to 271 of its 76th Report.

[1] See First Report, Case No. 2 (Venezuela), para. 142.

123. Paragraph 271 of the Committee's 76th Report, which was approved by the Governing Body at its 159th Session (June-July 1964), reads as follows:

In these circumstances, the Committee recommends the Governing Body—

(a) to take note that the inquiry arranged by the Government of the United Kingdom on the proposal of the Governing Body and entrusted to a Judge of the Court of Session (the Hon. Lord Cameron, D.S.C., Q.C.) has now been completed and that Lord Cameron's report on his inquiry has been presented to Parliament by the Minister of Labour, published and communicated to the International Labour Organisation;

(b) to note that the scope of the inquiry corresponds with that of the complaint which the Governing Body recommended the Government to submit to such an inquiry;

(c) to take note of Lord Cameron's rejection of the contention that Article 2 of the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), cannot be construed as applying to individual employers who are not members of employers' organisations;

(d) to note that, in accordance with the hope expressed by the Committee in paragraphs 241 and 242 of its 67th Report, the report of Lord Cameron contains a number of suggestions for both immediate and subsequent action which might lead to a permanent improvement of industrial relations in the banking industry, and to note further the Government's statement that officers of the Ministry of Labour are getting in touch with the organisations concerned to offer their help in following up those suggestions;

(e) to invite the Government to consider possible means of encouraging appropriate arrangements for determining the representative character of workers' organisations where necessary;

(f) to request the Government to inform the Governing Body as to further developments when the circumstances so allow.

124. The conclusions cited above were brought to the notice of the Government of the United Kingdom by a letter dated 18 June 1964.

125. In a letter dated 4 January 1966 the Government states that a working party comprising representatives of the majority of the London clearing banks, the Central Council of Bank Staff Associations and the National Union of Bank Employees was set up in July 1965 to consider the practicability of setting up national negotiating machinery for bank employees. The Government declares that the working party has made progress in its discussions, that the Ministry of Labour is keeping in touch with developments and that further information will be furnished as soon as it becomes available.

126. In these circumstances the Committee recommends the Governing Body—

(a) to take note of the Government's statement that a joint working party has been established for the purpose of considering the practicability of setting up national negotiating machinery for bank employees and that it has made progress in its discussions;

(b) to thank the Government for this information and to request it to be good enough to continue to keep the Governing Body informed of further developments in the matter.

Case No. 303:

Complaint Presented by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions against the Government of Ghana

127. This case was previously examined by the Committee at its meetings in October 1962[1], November 1963[2] and May 1965.[3] At its meeting in May 1965 the Committee, while submitting its definitive conclusions to the Governing Body on the remaining allegations, presented an interim report with regard to certain allegations relating to the legislation concerning trade unions and industrial relations in Ghana. The latter allegations, based on the provisions of the Industrial Relations Act, 1958, as amended in 1959 and 1960, are considered further in the present report. In this connection the Government has furnished the text of the Industrial Relations Act, 1965, which has repealed and replaced the enactments referred to above.

128. On 13 May 1957 the Government of Ghana, already a member of the United Nations, addressed to the Director-General of the International Labour Office a letter, signed by Mr. Kwame Nkrumah, the Prime Minister, in which Ghana formally accepted the obligations of the Constitution of the I.L.O. and thereby became a Member of the Organisation, by virtue of article 1, paragraph 3, of the Constitution, as from 20 May 1957, the date of receipt of the letter. In the same letter the Government of Ghana stated that it would continue to apply the provisions of the Right of Association (Non-Metropolitan Territories) Convention, 1947 (No. 84), pending formal ratification by Ghana of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), and the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98).[1] Ghana has ratified the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), but has not ratified the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87).

Allegations relating to the Legislation concerning Trade Unions and Industrial Relations in Ghana

(a) Allegations relating to the Monopoly of the Trades Union Congress of Ghana.

129. These allegations and the Government's observations thereon were examined by the Committee in paragraphs 254 to 265 of its 67th Report and again in paragraphs 176 to 183 of its 83rd Report.

130. In short, they were based on section 3 (1) of the Industrial Relations Act, 1958, which provided that the Trades Union Congress " shall act as the representative of the trade union movement in Ghana ", section 4 (1), providing that the Congress should consist of members of the trade unions listed in the First Schedule to the Act, and section 4 (3), empowering the Minister to add to or delete from that list the name of any trade union.

131. Having considered these provisions at its meeting in October 1962, together with other provisions which required any other existing union either to dissolve or to amalgamate with one of the scheduled unions and prohibited the registration of any new union without the consent of the Minister, the Committee recommended the Governing Body, in paragraph 323 (a) of its 67th Report, to draw the attention of the Government to the importance which the Governing Body has always attached to the generally accepted principles that workers should have the right to establish organisations of their own choosing without previous authorisation and that workers' organisations should have the right freely to form federations and confederations. The Committee also recommended the Governing Body to express the view that the legal provisions referred to above were not compatible with the aforesaid principles.

132. At its meeting in May 1965 the Committee, in the light of further information furnished by the Government, recommended the Governing Body, in paragraphs 184 and 236 (a) (i) of its 83rd Report, to note that the Government was considering amending the provisions in question.

133. The Government has forwarded the text of the new Industrial Relations Act, assented to on 23 June 1965, which has repealed the Act of 1958, as previously amended.

134. Section 1 (3) of the new Act provides that the Trades Union Congress shall continue to act as the representative of the trade union movement in Ghana " unless and until otherwise decided by the trade unions or any appropriate organisation of workers ". According to section 1 (4) the unions in the subsisting schedule shall continue to be members of the

[1] See Official Bulletin, Vol. XL, 1957, No. 8, p. 373.

Congress " without prejudice to the withdrawal therefrom or addition thereto of any trade union upon the decision of such trade union ". According to section 1 (5), upon such withdrawal from or addition to the membership of the Congress, the Minister " shall " by legislative instrument amend the schedule accordingly. The new Act appears to contain no provision restricting the registration of new trade unions in accordance with the Trade Unions Ordinance, 1941, as amended.

135. In these circumstances the Committee recommends the Governing Body—

(a) to note that the Industrial Relations Act, 1958, as amended in 1959 and 1960, has been repealed and replaced by the Industrial Relations Act, 1965;

(b) to note that the new legislation appears to have removed the previous restrictions on the adhesion of trade unions to the Congress and the requirement of the consent of the Minister to the registration of new trade unions.

(b) Allegations relating to Compulsory Union Membership.
